Ambitions of college "flivver" owners are realized in an automobile on the University of Texas campus, which is equipped with 11 horns, three windshields, two windshield wipers, and a locomotive oil can as accessories. For the backseat driver, rear seat control is furnished. Lights, horns, and accessories in general are at the fingertips of those who wish to direct the driver. There is even a rangefinder to plot the position of any chance pedestrian the driver might wish to hit. The vehicle has only one motor.

Queer Sea Denizens Of Hawaii Described

Huge oysters, whose shells closed tight over unwary human feet, and from which there was no escape; fish that could at one bite take off the hand of a man; or with poisonous, knife-like spines, could make huge gashes in the hand when held; and octopi with tentacles up to twenty feet long, were some of the weird sea-animals described by Dr. John Stanley in his talk to the Natural History Club on Thursday afternoon, on the "Coral Gardens of the Pacific."

Dr. Stanley, who was recently in Hawaii, first gave an outline of how coral islands are formed. In most cases it is due to the ceaseless energy of the coral-polyps, which build up extensive reefs upon previously existing plateaux in the ocean. These islands are necessarily limited by the extent of the plateaux.

The speaker next described the types of beaches, lagoons and fringing reefs found in Hawaii. The reef itself is generally just awash and separated from the mainland by a stretch of calm water, the lagoon. The animal life on these reefs, down to a depth of about 30 or 40 feet is extremely rich and varied. If one were to dive down to a depth of about 20 feet, one was at once introduced to a new, strange world of color and movement. Fish in thousands of colors vieing in intensity and variety with those of the spectrum; and in length from three-foot trigger-fish down to mere half inch specks of color, would crowd around full of curiousity. If a pieces of meat were impaled on a three-pronged fork and taken down the fish would fearlessly feed but a few inches from the intruder's face.

Within the reefs, sharks were not very common but outside, Dr. Stanley said, it was foolish for anyone to venture, who entertained the slightest hope of returning alive.

An account of octopus-hunting was given. The octopi were grabbed by the body. They would then try to cling to one's arm with their tentacles; but if the arm had been well spat upon previously the octopus generally let go. By a quick movement the unfortunate animal would then be neatly turned inside-out, and would then be ready for market. They are eaten by the Japanese.

Prof. Prince Will Lecture On "The Madonna In Art"

Professor A. E. Prince will give an illustrated talk on "The Madonna in Art" to members of the Kingston Art Association this afternoon in the Douglas Library, Room 111.

Reproduction of works to be discussed will be on view from 4.30 p.m. and the talk will begin at 5 sharp.

This is the second of a series of talks on Art and Artists arranged by the executive of the Kingston Art Association. This association is in a flourishing condition this season evidenced by the attendance at the recent opening talk by Mr. E. C. Kyte, and by the enthusiasm of those who gather regularly on Monday evenings in Room 111 of the Douglas Library.

Quill To Make Debut At End of Next Week

The Queen' Quill will make its appearance towards the end of next week, the Journal was informed today. Mr. W. H. Agnew, the Business Manager of the Quill, and Miss Mary Fraser, who is in charge of circulation are at present making ready to ensure that the sales organization of the magazine shall be able to cope with the large demand that is expected.

Mr. Eric Gilmour, the Editor-in-chief, in an interview yesterday revealed some of the interesting features of the forthcoming issue. "A long short story called 'Way of Escape' by J. H. Bell, and a short short story entitled 'C'est la Guerre' by a young student who refuses to disclose his identity, are particularly worthy of attention," Mr. Gilmour remarked. "The verse also is of a high standard; Miss Fyfe will again be represented, and the December Quill will include also the work of a number of new contributors, many of them of great promise."

"Besides the usual departments of 'Shreds and Patches' and Book Reviews, the forthcoming issue will contain an illuminating medical article, 'Mainly about Operations.' a paper on the work of Daniel Fowler, the famous Kingston artist, an extremely interesting article by J. D. Bateman recounting some of his own experience in the mines, and a racy description of life on a steamboat by R. U. Mahaffy. These and a number of other features which I have not the time to mention now, all serve to make the new Quill a magazine of wide interest, and an undergraduate publication of which I feel Queen's will have reason to be proud." Mr. Gilmour added, "The Quill will make a very appropriate Christmas gift."

The price of the Queen's Quill is 25c a copy.

Dr. Stanley, who is the President of Dalhousie University, has had an interesting career. He graduated from Toronto with a brilliant degree, won a Rhodes Scholarship, and entering New College, Oxford, secured a first in "Greats." He returned to Canada and joined the staff of the University of Toronto. Subsequently he went into business for a period of nine years.

At the end of this time he joined the staff of McGill University, where he was Professor of Classics and Assistant to the Principal. He became President of Dalhousie in 1931.

Remarking Of Floor Will Aid Basketeers

Enables Two Teams To Practice At Once

If the students have been holidaying, Jimmie Bews and his cohorts have not been, as a stroll into the gym. will show. While the opening of the Senior Basketball schedule does not take place until Jan. 28th, the gym. is already decked out in various colored markings so that practices can be held by two teams at the same time. The big floor space has been marked out with red lines for east and west basketball courts, and baskets are now in position. The courts will be divided by a ten foot net which will be hoisted out of the way when not required.

The main basketball court for scheduled games is well marked with heavy black lines, while four Badminton courts are also marked out with white paint.

The floor is all set for a heavy winter's work and how it will get it.

Dr. H. Tracy Heads Classics Department

Prof. Law Returning To Lecture At Queen's

The students of Queen's are delighted to learn of Professor H. L. Tracy's appointment as head of the Classics Department. He has already assumed his new duties in this capacity, ably filling the vacancy left by the sad death of Dr. R. O. Jolliffe.

Dr. Tracy has been a member of the Faculty of Queen's University for the past six years. He came to Kingston in 1926 from the University of Manitoba, where he had lectured for three years. He entered the University of Toronto with the class of '18. During the Great War Dr. Tracy served with the Royal Air Force and later completed his studies at Varsity in 1921. From Toronto he entered the University of Chicago where he received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. Dr. Tracy now holds the Shorey Travelling Fellowship from that college.

He possesses remarkable knowledge of the Classics and has the happy faculty of making a "Dead Language" live again, so that his lectures are exceedingly popular among Arts students.

Professor L. E. Law is returning immediately from abroad to resume his lecturing in Classics. Mr. Law was granted a year's leave of absence at the end of the 1931-32 session, but has been recalled as a result of the death of Dr. R. O. Jolliffe.

Library Authorities Effect New System

Loss Of Books Made Changes Imperative

Students who have been on the third floor of the Douglas Library since the Christmas vocation will have noticed several changes in the reading-room. The space previously occupied by the special reserved books presents an expanse of vacant shelves. In front of the door to the old Medical Library is the desk that used to be in the north-west corner of the reading-room.

These changes have been brought about by a revision in the system of handling the reserved books. Formerly the students were at liberty to take from the shelves, the books wanted after having signed the book-card. This system was not very efficient insofar as the check on the books was inaccurate. Furthermore, the loss through theft was becoming too great not to be considered.

During the "rush season" of exam. time certain unscrupulous students remove the books from the shelves without signing the card and fail to return them. Such persons, as well as hindering other students who needed the books, cause the University considerable loss. In fact the actual number stolen in a year runs in the neigh-

Premier L. A. Taschereau Sees Need For Careful Immigration Policies To Increase Canadian Population Variety Of Subjects Discussed By Quebec Premier In Interview

Editor's Note: The following is an exclusive interview recently accorded by the Hon. L. A. Taschereau to the News Editor of the Queen's Journal.

In an exclusive interview given to the Queen's Journal during the Christmas vacation, the Hon. L. A. Taschereau, Premier of Quebec, emphatically declared his belief that the population of Canada needed to be greatly increased by means of a careful immigration policy. The Premier, who dealt with a wide variety of topics in the course of the interview, paid a tribute to Queen's in referring with pride to the fact that he was an honorary graduate of this college.

Alluding to the work of the University in Canada I asked the Premier—"What is your opinion of the part played by the Universities in the life of Eastern Canada especially?"

"I think they have been an important factor in promoting goodwill and good understanding between the English and French speaking people of Canada," the Premier replied. He went on to speak of his recent visit to Toronto for the celebration of the centenary of the University, and of the number of addresses which were given there in French, and with satisfaction, he added, "they seemed to be well understood."

The Premier also referred, in passing, to one of the English Public School boys touring Canada last year, who gave an excellent address in French that was much appreciated in Quebec.

Questioned as to the value of the interchange of students between universities, the Premier pointed out that many students go from Quebec to European Universities and to the University of Paris especially, and expressed the belief that such movements were a valuable factor in education.

I now raised the question of the population of Canada, and, quoting a statement that appeared in the Queen's Journal last term, asked the Premier whether he would agree that the population of the Dominion had almost reached saturation point." The Premier expressed some surprise that such a view should prevail anywhere, and stated emphatically that he could not agree with it, but was convinced that, on the contrary, Canada required a very considerable increase in population. "I believe," he stated with decision, "that Canada needs a great increase in immigration, not indeed the overflow of Europe, but plenty of immigration of the right kind." "Ought this emigration to be agricultural in character," I asked. "Yes," he replied, but went on to qualify his affirmative by explaining that in his view mixed farming, and not wheat cultivation solely, ought to be undertaken. In answer to a further query the Premier agreed that the agricultural frontier could be pushed farther northward than at present.

Referring to the present condition of the wheat market, I drew atten-

Second Year Commerce Student Travels Half Way Around World To Get Education

Registered at Queen's in second year Commerce is a student who might well claim the "official long distance record." Wilfred Brace is a resident of interior China and his home is over 2,000 miles inland from the Pacific Ocean. His father is the Y.M.C.A. representative at the Cheng-tu on a branch of the Yang-tse river in the province of Szechuan in West China. The attraction of Queen's Commerce courses is great enough to induce him to travel over 6,000 miles by boat and 3,000 miles by rail to enroll within our walls of learning. His parental home is so nearly on the opposite side of the earth from Kingston that it makes very little difference whether he travels east around Africa or west across the Pacific Ocean to get here. Although of English extraction Mr. Brace plans to go into business in China when he graduates from Queen's. Other universities may be able to show students who can equal this mileage record but none can beat it.

A native of Porto Rico travelled across the United States to enter Queen's because of the influence of a friend and because Queen's graduates have a reputation in that part of the world. A co-ed, similarly, travelled all the way from Kobe, Japan, to enroll at Queen's because her mother was a graduate and had a warm spot in her heart for her old Alma Mater.

Queen's has of recent years become a more cosmopolitan university. Every year the number of students from points outside Ontario or Canada increases. Sixteen hundred odd students are registered at Queen's this year. Only

Station C. F. R. C. Heard At Vancouver

Tests Prove Power Of Broadcasting Unit

Several days ago Queen's University radio station CFRC gave a special program at four o'clock in the morning in order to get an idea of the area covered by the station and to give radio fans an opportunity of logging it. The program consisted of short talks on the station, Queen's University, Kingston and vicinity, as well as the playing of gramophone records. To date 94 letters have been received from all over Canada and the United States commenting on the reception and complimenting the station.

In the majority of cases the reception was reported as excellent with practically no interference, strong signal, little or no fading, excellent tone and good modulation. The greatest distance heard from so far is Vancouver, British Columbia, and Jefferson, Oregon. Twenty of the States have reported altogether, and three of the provinces.

The program was staged by members of the Electric Department of Queen's University and they are quite gratified by the letters received. Prof. S. C. Morgan acted as supervisor and announcer while H. H. Stewart was the station operator.

It will be remembered that the officials of the Queen's station held a similar test about a year ago, at which time the station was heard as far as Oklahoma City, a distance of about 1300 miles from Kingston.

Exchange Awards To Be Available Here

N.F.C.U.S. Announces Conditions Of Award

With the announcement of the Exchange Scholarships for 1933-34, a limited number of students at Queen's University have the opportunity of obtaining a year's scholarship at some other Canadian University. These scholarships, which are sponsored by the National Federation of Canadian University Students, enable students to study at an "exchange" university for one year without paying tuition fees or Students Union Fees. The N.F.C.U.S. representative on this campus is the president of the Students Council and prospective applicants can obtain full details from him.

The Exchange of Undergraduate Plan was initiated about five years ago by the executive of the N.F.C.U.S. and came into operation four years ago after the presidents, registrars and financial authorities of the Canadian Universities had given their consent. Under the plan the universities are divided into four groups—the University of British Columbia, the universities of the Prairie Provinces, the universities of Ontario and Quebec, and the universities of the Maritime. Science '35 Plans Colourful Dance To Start Season

First Dance Of Term To Be Unique And Very Brilliant Affair

What a day, what a day, the first Journal of '33, and the first dance of '33. Good Lord what now? O.K. Mr. Editor, I won't be long. How's that Wilf? Aw, correct it yourself Ted. But what's all this about a dance anyway, who's having a dance at this time of the term? What, have I got to go through all that again. Oh, all right then I'll tell you all about it.

Haven't you heard about it, haven't you seen all the posters? We've lost enough of them, as fast as we put them up somebody pinches them. Well anyway good old Scienz '35 is having a dance, and what a dance, the first student hop of 1933, and original, boy, you don't know the half of it, you've got to go to it to find out all about that. When is it? To-night, Friday, 6th, at nine o'clock, at the La Salle, and our pal Hopkirk, the old Maestro, is going to shake his baton over the heads of a lot of little maestros, and music will be emitted forthwith.

And the dancing is not all, Scott and Emery, those intrepid '35ers will toss in a specialty number with their violin and banjo. Bill Gummer will attempt to make another piano plead for mercy, and last but most certainly not least, Miss Lebo Ware will sing for us as only a southerner can sing.

And the price, good gosh man, don't bother about that, what's a buck and a quarter at this time of the year, when everybody's just loaded with Christmas money.

Madonna's Influence On Artists Traced

Prof. A. Prince Spoke To Art Association

"The Madonna in Art" was the subject of an address by Prof. A. E. Prince at the Douglas Library late last semester, given under the auspices of the Kingston Art Association. The lecturer traced the growing influence of the Madonna as an inspiration of artists from early Christian centuries to the period of the Renaissance. He pointed out the importance of this influence in the great period of church and cathedral building in western Europe and traced the development of the painter's art as shown in pictures representing the Madonna. The lecture was illustrated by numerous reproductions of works of art from the Carnegie Art Collection in the Douglas Library which has been opened by the University authorities to members of the Art Association.

Taking Stock

This is the time of the year when most financial organizations undertake their annual inventories in order to ascertain exactly how much or how little success has attended their efforts during the year's operations. This knowledge can only result in a better organized and a more comprehensive campaign for the new year. It is with this thought in mind that we believe that a similar procedure of stock taking could advantageously be undertaken by a college student. We have barely crossed the threshold of a New Year. But before we advance too far along its path it is well to look back over the year we have just finished—and especially the semester that has just ended. Before blotting the new leaf with spilled ink, why not total up the debits and credits on the old one.

Does this new year mark for you the strong finish of one year and the purposeful, worthy, resolute beginning of another?

Perhaps one of the first and most important matters to consider is the one of health. How are you physically? Have you been playing jokes on your tummy with too much hooch or excessive eating? Have you been keeping your muscles hard and your blood red?

Have you done anything to boast yourself spiritually? There's more to this business of living than the mere pursuit of pleasure and the satisfaction of our personal whims and desires. On reflection, very few of us will not freely admit that the objectives of the year 1932 have remained beyond our reach through failure to put forth our best. Our shortcomings should be very apparent to us now, and should remain as stepping-stones to greater effort.

The student's extra-curricular activities should also be carefully considered at this time. Has too much time been spent in these activities? Have your studies suffered as a result? It will readily be admitted that these activities serve a distinct purpose and should be part of every student's college career. On the other hand, are you one of those who has neglected to take part in these activities? The contacts formed in these organizations and the executive experience gained is invaluable, and it is our belief that a college career should be more than a four year concentration on the theories and facts of the past, but should be tempered by extra-curricular activities.

The rose-tinted dreams we had when 1932 was an infant are naught but dreams to-day. The ambitions we cherished a year ago are still cuddling in our hearts unrealized. We know the feeling of such disconsolating thoughts. But just because we did not make the grade is no reason why we should sit down on the edge of the New Year in sackcloth and ashes. For the old husk of 1932 and the worthwhile things we hoped to accomplish while it lasted—we say, Let 1932 R.I.P.

This New Year is fairly bristling with possibilities for us. There are things to be done. Let's start at once! Good luck to you all!

A Resignation

We are sorry, indeed, to announce the resignation of J. N. Milne as the Journal Science Associate Editor. Succumbing to the Christmas examination onslaught "Chappie" has set a vigorous course of action for himself, and the Journal is the unfortunate loser.

We are sorry that he was forced to sever his connections with the Journal, and hope that he may find time to contribute at least occasionally.

What Has It Profited Any Nation To Go To War?

I have always been proud of an ancestral apostle of peace, John Bright, dead these forty years, but always a man with the courage of his convictions. Indeed, one speech of his delivered in a little town in North Wales in 1876, was a forceful that it was a quarter of a century before the munition-makers could again persuade England to send brothers and sons to be slaughtered. Not until the death of John Bright had any Prime Minister the temerity to declare war on any country or bow to the decrees of the professional warriors.

In what way has war benefitted Britain? Even to-day she is paying half the cost of the Great War, during which no part of the Imperial territory was even invaded.

The League of Nations was formed at the instance of a man from New Jersey, one of the two States of the Union which were peopled and settled by pioneers who voyaged to America that they might escape the endless turmoil of Europe. Yet the different nation-members of the League have failed to send delegates who had not only the courage of their convictions, but a sound training in peace convictions. The League thus far is a question mark. Hopeful and trustful in the ultimate outcome, yet at critical moments this Peace Tribunal lacks force just as did Sir Edward Grey at Berlin in 1914.

Looking backard at the costly wars of a century and beyond, the wars of Britain in the yesteryears force the verdict of history that they have all been fruitless, and had even caused the fall of the Empire had it been less sturdy and resilient.

Within a few years after its close the American Revolutionary War was condemned by every Englishman as a huge error on the King's part.

Japan, fighting to-day for Manchuria, will find that it has gotten only an Ireland on its hands.

Within a few years after the Crimean War, founded and prompted through a propaganda of fear against Russia and alleged designs on Asia, there was a very remarkable change of opinion in England. It has cost the countries engaged a million precious lives and many millions in money. There was no credit on the ledger, for nothing was gained.

Joining the monarchial countries over a century ago to prevent France becoming a Republic, spending twenty years and many millions of lives, we find now that all the countries involved, except England, have a republican form of government. History does not record any other issue at stake, beyond the fear that the French Republic might be too aggressive in resenting plots against its new form of government.

Yet here again Britain was saddled with the debts of herself and many of the continental nations. There was no gain recorded, but for twenty years after there was gloom in England, and many wives and children bereft.

The timorous and the fearsome did not regain their courage for many years.

The countries of Europe are still arming, each one in deadly fear of the other, and even somnolent Russia is looked upon as aggressive because some of the more simple-minded creatures think to visit other countries and spread their ideas of commonwealth and community life. Russia can do as she pleases, but she cannot spread any fear except through the publicity of the munition-mongers.

What does war matter?

True, its gains not for the war-like, nor does the aggressor ever get any more than what the lawyers leave for the litigants to share—

But it matters much to the widows and orphans, the sisters and brothers when the very flower of the youth of the countries are thrust into the trenches to be rent asunder by shot and shell, and to be left lingering on the field or in the hospitals suffering such intense agonies that death is a hoped-for relief. There is no money, no land, no gain so valuable as the life of a single one of these young men.

Believe it not that any criticisms of the Soviets of Russia is calculated to inspire hatred against the Russians. They were poorly led and greatly bled, and to them any change in form of government was intoxicating. But we do resent their efforts to force civilization back to the era when David had a war on his hands every year in Palestine, or when Nebuchadnezzar thought that year lost when he did not conquer some new tribe between China and Egypt. We do not sigh for the Babylonic days of two thousand years ago just because some benighted nation has begun to practise thinking.

Let us be aggressive for tranquility and for peace and for understanding. We went to war to end war. That failed. Let us return to brain work. Lifelong professors of peace should alone be members of the League of Nations—not just the ordinary run of mine politicians.

She was so wonderful, so beautiful,
So gorgeous and divine; If she were mine?
But sh' ain't, and thus my life is pitiable.
Out, trusty flask, and drown my woes in wine.
I promised her my heart, my hand, my name;
She turned me down, the cruelest cut of cuts;
And now, to live, is Hell, to die, the same;
And life, for me, is just a bowl of nuts.
But come, perhaps, e'en now, all is not lost.
Hola! Quick boy, my sword, my shield, my horse;
I swear, I'll get that dame, at any cost;
What kindness fails, a Douglas takes by force.
Giddap! I'm off. Swift as the wind I fly;
I'll wed that gal, or know the reason why.

Students Undergo Harrowing Ordeals In Tombstone City Boarding Houses

Editor's Note: Mrs. Mac. the statements here under set forth do not apply to your establishment and are not in any way to be construed as reflecting upon the integrity of your boarding house. (See Page 6578, Chap. 5, Sec. 3, Official Secrets Act).

Boarding houses have been a fruitful source of discussion since the beginning of time. Homer mentions the "insufficient sameness" and "vacuous vacancies" of the fodder handed out to the Grecian heroes. Virgil's lament, "Porcus, Prunus, Hashus, execro" has come down from the misty time of Rome. Even the noble minded Shakespeare, fine-fibred personality that he was, could not resist the temptation to mention the provender dished out in his time. "Wine, Women and Hash, but chiefly Hash are the great mysteries of life" Malvolio exclaims. (Hamlet Act 7, Scene 12, Line 2.) And again in Love's Labour Lost Prospero cries despairingly, "What, Mulligatawney again? I'll have none of it. A horse, a horse, my kingdom for a horse" (Act 3½, Scene 8, Line 4.)

Coming down to modern times, (since 1929) we find that the cries of injustice going up to heaven from boarding house habitues have perplexed even the editor himself.

However, it must be remembered that landladies are vigilant in suppressing free speech and many a student would rather gulp down a sausage tasting like a boot than give any evidence that he was not enjoying the cursed thing. But the unspoken thought is there. Only the other day a sufferer on Clergy Street, gnashing his teeth against a piece of wood in a sausage rose in his wrath. "I don't mind eating the dog but I'm danged if I'll eat his kennel too," he roared.

Freshmen should know by now that landladies, doctors and undertakers in Kingston are in close cahoots and work harmoniously. But seriously, the exasperating thing about boarding house fare is its regularity. The chief cook has her hereditary menu and one can safely predict what will be served next Wednesday or what was served last Wednesday, or the Wednesday Queen's won the checker championship sixteen years ago. Some students never get a calendar but recognize the day by the fare. One landlady lost her menu and had to borrow one from a friend. About the time of Augustus this friend had dropped a day in her calculations and the borrowed menu threw twenty-two students off their reckoning so that twenty-two students missed classes for two days until this error was called to their attention.

A reporter came into the Office the other day and woke up the staff with loud cheers. He inquired of the exuberant reporter as to the reason for the merriment. "Our landlady has some new coffee grounds," he whooped and flew off to spread the news. Judge, isn't this grounds for manslaughter?

The W. C. T. U. should investigate also the serving of overproof dessert. A freshman from Podunk Corners who had never allowed alcohol to touch his lips before was exposed to some aged cherries in one of the local feeding houses. The alcoholic content was so high that his animal cravings for alcohol overcame his better nature. He took to drinking beer, beat up his wife, murdered his children, and became a gangster in Napanee. Here clearly was a case where the unscrupulous avarice of landladies drove an innocent young soul to the dogs and Napanee.

Boarding house conditions lead to whispering campaigns and much of our political slander can be traced to the early influence of boarding house custom. For instance, when the meat is brought in, the whisper, "Is it tough, to-day?" runs along the table and the meat is damned by the nodded reply. How can students develop their own judgment when it must be done at the risk of their indigestive apparatus? Even the ostrich draws the line at some things but tough experience teaches the student he must either accept the dictum of the experts or perish like an overstuffed oyster.

On October 3, 1929, a notable incident occurred in a Division Street hash-house. The chief factotum of the culinary department became aware that something unusual was brewing. She asked one of the students whom she thought would give her a favourable answer because of his affinity for her good-looking daughter, what he thought about the meat. "I think it's great," returned the engineer, (he was a Science man by the way). The landlady glared around triumphantly and considered herself vindicated, but was speedily abashed.

"That's because you were marooned on an Alaskan Island all summer and lived on walrus meat and moccasins," retorted the Science man's bosom pal.

This week a student was found wandering about on the civic garbage dump. Seventeen medical students declare seventeen different ailments are afflicting him but the true story can be obtained from Hiram Askmeanother, Arts '3 . Hiram himself had a narrow escape at the same time.

Hiram and X were absorbing soup at a certain notorious nourishment house. Hiram found a knitting needle. X went one better and fished out a candle. Hiram took another spoonful and brought up a fork. X with a hopeful gleam in his eye dipped his spoon into the swirling, colourless maelsrom and up came a telephone directory. Both the diners naturally accepted it as a piece of meat and X chewed away rather resignedly until more than half of the lump had disappeared. Then the landlady entered asking for the directory and X was caught red-handed. He felt so guilty at being caught in such a flagrant act of vandalism that he tottered outside and subsided into an empty garbage can from whence he was carried to the civic dump.

It is any wonder that Kingston girls who feed their gentlemen friends are far more popular at Queen's than those who hail from afar?

Renewed Interest In Good Books Noticed

It is being realized more fully that books afford not only a means of acquiring knowledge but also a means of entertainment and recreation. Whether prevailing economic conditions have anything to do with this or not, is hard to say, but university and public libraries are reporting large increases in circulation. Students who realize the full advantage of developing a taste for good literature, and who grasp the opportunity of doing so while at college will never lack a source of entertainment or instruction, no matter what may be their occupation.

A contemplated addition to the various reading-room facilities of Queen's is a "browsing-room." It is hoped that at some future date a room in the Douglas Library will be set aside for students to pass away a spare moment. There will be no tables, but the room will be furnished with easy chairs, where the student may come and spend part of his spare time among the books placed at his disposal.

The room will have in it the books purchased under the terms of the Carnegie Grant and chosen by a committee made up in part by students. Already part of the grant has been used and books have arrived. The total amount received will enable a library of nearly five thousand volumes to be purchased in the course of three years. Very shortly a list of the books nok available will be published and will be obtainable at the main desk of the reading-room.

War Rumours Make Interesting Reading

The Office was cleaned out yesterday and while the Chief Janitor was washing the top of the News Editor's desk the following article floated up from the walnut finish. Apparently the article is a record kept by a member of the Queen's Contingent in the hectic days of 1915.

Rumours current on S.S. "Northland" (Canadian Troopship) Montreal to Plymouth, June 29th to July 9th, 1915.

Wed 30th—Midnight. All is well. 8 a.m. Reported by Irishman from Montreal at breakfast that he was partly devoured by some strange and unknown insect while asleep in his bunk.

A mysterious vessel is following us down the St. Lawrence. Reported that she is a supply ship for German submarines awaiting us in the Gulf.

We are going to Halifax (so the Mounted Rifles say) but the Officer's steward overheard the Mate say that the Captain didn't know where he was going.

10 p.m. Irishman reports bugs in our sleeping quarters. Listeners shudder and go up on deck to sleep but soon came down again when crew starts to wash down with the hose.

Roll call to-morrow.

Thur. 1st — Reported that, through the night, the "Northland" challenged the steamer behind to draw off or she would fire at her.

8 a.m.—No vessels in sight.

Irishman loses water bottle and blames bugs.

Reported that we are making for Halifax to take on more troops. Said troops to be towed behind "Northland" on rafts.

Reported that all tradesmen on ship are to be attested to construct rafts.

The Moose Jaw insurance agent draws a compass on deck and after much figuring declares we are making direct for Liverpool. Along comes the crew with the hose and wash compass away.

Kingston C.F.A. got it straight from their officer that we are going direct to France.

No more beer to be sold on board. 140 cases of drunkenness.

Reported that Germans had issued in New York papers notice of intentions to destroy the "Northland" on this trip. The Allan Liner "Hesperian" sunk with all hands. Women and children all lined up on deck and shot first.

Reported that 12 Turkish Transports have been sunk.

10 p.m. Ships biscuits issued. Much growling and gnashing of teeth.

In future, everyone to make his own bed. Bed-making exercise to-morrow.

Fri. 2nd. 9 a.m. A whale is seen on the starboard by some. It disappears. Opinions differ. Some maintain that it was no whale but a submarine. It comes into sight and turns out to be a Newfoundland fishing smack.

Reported that one of the stewards has jumped overboard and his brother weeps his eyes out.

Reported in Canadian and American papers that our boat has been sunk with all troops.

Reported that one of the stokers has died with fright at hearing the story about the whale.

Smoking prohibited between decks.

Reported that we are carrying thousands of rounds of ammunition, also a gun on the stern and two quick firers on either side.

Reported that we must wash and shave our faces tomorrow.

Sat. 3rd—Reported that we passed in the night, an iceberg, a big steamer all lit up and a small boat.

Reported that the liner with the 30th Reg't on board has been sunk by submarines.

Kitchener again assassinated.

By the Moose Jaw insurance agent compass we are always travelling S.S.E., and by the Sun, E. Sun must be wrong.

One liner is ahead of us with troops, another behind with horses.

10 p.m.—Serg't calls for volunteers to bury dead stoker at sea.

Ship begins to roll and pitch.

Serg't picks six men out of two hundred that offer to bury dead stoker. Leads them to six buckets. Tells them that it is going to be a storm and if anyone is sick just to run with the bucket to them. Six men curse at being stung.

Lifebelts at Church Parade to-morrow.

Sun. 4th—Sunday morning at Church Parade, lifebelts to be strapped well up under the armpits to ensure the owner floating right side up. Sermon: "The dead shall rise out of the deep and claim their inheritance." Irishman says "That day will be a bigger mix-up than the present war."

A mysterious boat appears to be following us and it is reported that the C.A.M.C. is to man the guns if they can find any ammunition.

Reported that we will be definately landed at Aberdeen.

Reported that our escort shall meet us tomorrow.

Reported that there is food only for another three days. All hands to be put on half rations to-morrow.

Mon. 5th—Reported that the "Northland" stopped her engines at midnight and described three complete circles.

The Moose Jaw Insurance agent draws a compass and declares that we have altered our course 600 miles since yesterday and that we are sailing S.E.S. We are not going to Aberdeen at all, but via Gibraltar for service in Egypt with the rest of the Second Contingent.

Reported by our eagle eyed amateur look-out that the convoy is in sight.

There will be an order to stand by the lifeboats at 2 a.m. for practice.

Tues. 6th—Look-out must be able to see half around the world, as convoy is not in sight yet.

Reported that we are now in the danger zone. 40 volunteers required for service in the stoke hold.

Reported our convoy in sight, but turns out to be a small steamer which continues its way westward.

Wednesday, 7th—Dance expected.

Reported that our convoy came up with us in the night, but leaves

A Chinese Letter

The isolation and inconveniences which trouble the country physician at times fade into insignificance when compared with the difficulties, but fortunately the Chinese manage to bring healing to men's soul's as well as their bodies. These extracts are from a letter to Dr. Gibson, written by Dr. J. E. Revelle of the class of '27, now doing medical missionary work in Luchow, Szechuen, China.

"Am still working at the Ramanovsky stain. When it does come out right, it produces a beautiful picture, the red cells, old rose, the white cells standing out as brilliantly, and even the blood platelets picked out with red and purple and blue. And yet it is as whimsical as a bad-tempered girl. Using exactly the same water it can give quite different results. I sent for some buffer solution, but the results were disastrous. There wasn't a sign of the smear when I got through, and so I am sticking to distilled water which I made myself with an all glass and rubber outfit. But I must admit I haven't found malaria on any of my own smears yet. The Chinese won't admit they have malaria unless they have an actual fit of ague, but, remembering the myriad forms malaria can take, patients coming in with vague symptoms that don't suit any well-known disease, get quinine on the benefit of the doubt, and in the great majority of cases, with good results. As far as I can find out, Chinese medicine does not use quinine. How did they ever combat it before the foreigners introduced it? Of course they think nothing of losing a patient and I suppose malaria patients either died or got better. The body can develop some immunity, I understand, and one advice is to let the patient have some good chills before starting quinine, as a means of developing this immunity."

The unemployment situation is apparently unheard of among these field workers. Here is an example of what would be called a busy day by most people.

"Up before six. An hour's study of Chinese before breakfast. Morning prayers at the hospital. Visit some fifteen inpatients, then the outpatients, some 93 this day. Of course I don't examine them all. Some just come in for a change of dressings. A man sat in my study while I ate lunch, waiting to escort me outside the south gate to see his sick sister. Got back late for tea, but brewed my own. Then two small operations at the hospital, finishing at seven. The servant of the outcall patient was waiting with various specimens, which I examined. After supper had to prepare, in Chinese, a sermon for the next morning, as it was my turn to lead morning prayers."

"I judge the condition of my health by the quickness of my temper, but fortunately the Chinese understand bad tempers. You can hear women bullyragging for a block, and they soon forget."

There is not supposed to be kala-azar here, according to the textbooks, but a boy in the hospital last week gave the aldehyde tests and had a very low leukocyte count. We sent him home till we should get some tartar emetic from Hankow, and try it on him. He had hookworm too and got treatment for that. We have five hundred dollars of an old grant, to buy equipment, and if we don't use it this year, it will likely be given to someone else. I don't know yet whether a quartz lamp, which we could use only at night, or a diathermy outfit, is worth the expense to us. Such things would probably impress the Chinese—no race is more gullible. It irritates me to see how they patronize their quack doctors, though I recall that such gentlemen draw a good trade at home. We would beat them if we could bring in the whole artillery of Western medicine, but I would like to beat them, on their own terms with only a leather grip in my hand."

General practioners who cannot reach hospital centres conveniently would probably become optimists after a few months in Central China.

S. C. M. Shrapnel

To all the readers of this column—A Happy New Year! The writer of this article being neither a politician nor a financial magnate cannot foresee the return of prosperity in 1933. We hope the above mentioned groups do, but this is one place where hope exceeds faith.

The local S.C.M. has a proposition to present. The facts are as follows. January 13, 14, 15, there will be a week-end conference. The theme will be "Which Way Religion?" It is widely recognized that what popularly goes as religion has lost much of the vitality religion is supposed to have. Which way will religion go from its present status?

On Friday night Mrs. Vlastos will guide the discussion along the lines of religion in personal life. At the supper, 5.30 Saturday evening, Rev. D. A. McLennan of Montreal will speak at 8.00 p.m. Prof. Eric Havelock of Victoria College will lead the discussion on religion in community life. Sunday morning Mr. D. K. Faris, Queen's '24, will give some light on "the Laymen's Report." Sunday afternoon Prof. Rogers will speak on "Religion in International Relations." Delegates are expected from Montreal and Toronto. All of these leaders are vitally interested in life. There will, however, be more of this later.

ten per cent. of these come from Kingston. Eighty-two per cent. hail from Ontario and about ninety-two per cent. come from Canada. The remainder come from various foreign countries—mostly from the United States.

The Province of Quebec ranks next to Ontario in its contribution to the student body at Queen's, with a total of around 65. Saskatchewan is next and British Columbia ranks next. Every province or district in Canada is represented with the exception of the Northwest Territories. Ten per cent. of the total registration is contributed by these provinces.

Within the last two years a few students have come to Queen's on exchange schemes, and at present one of these, a co-ed from Germany, is studying chemistry at Queen's. The Anglo-Canadian Education Committee is responsible for the increased numbers of British students at Queen's, and under its auspices during the past two years practically all the students from the United Kingdom have come to Canada.

The United States sends forty-two students and more than half of these come from the state of New York. Ten other states are represented. These include, Oklahoma, Massachusetts, Tennessee, New Jersey, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Wisconsin, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Michigan. Most of those who come from far points come here because of the advice of the family doctor, or family friends who have graduated from Queen's and do not forget the little grey university at Kingston.

Other countries represented at Queen's are Jamaica, B.W.I., Newfoundland, Ireland, Denmark, Finland and Portugal.

QUEBEC LANDSCAPE

Roses of sunset, flowering in the sky,
Pools of rose and silver glittering below;
Twittering bird songs now begin to die,
Trees are standing, watching for the day to go.

Shadows are falling, lengthening to rest;
Dim the skies are; tenderly withdrawn
Loveliness sleeps now quiet in the West.
Earth is waiting, darkling, for the light of dawn.

AT THE CAPITOL

TESS OF THE STORM COUNTRY
Janet Gaynor and Charles Farrell

Fans of the Gaynor-Farrell cinema team will enjoy their work in "Tess of the Storm", their latest effort. Shorn of the clattering and clanking of the customary trappings of advance publicity, "Tess of the Storm Country" proves to be an interesting picture, much better than the average Gaynor-Farrell talkie, where the winsomness of Janet and the "bonne camaderie" of Farrell are played up unrestrainedly.

The picture should have been called "Tess on the Spot" for Janet pulls the "rescue act" no less than four times during the course of this slow moving story.

The opening part of the picture is reminiscent of Joan Lowell's book, "Cradle of the Deep." Realizing that his daughter, born and reared at sea, is no longer safe on the ship, where all women are looked on as perverts and the men are not slow to take advantage of this fact, the father takes his daughter on land where men live in rubber-tired boats, and sea-sickness comes in bottles. From there on there is unravelled the struggle of the father and daughter to adjust themselves to life on land.

You do not have to be a Gaynor-Farrell fan to enjoy this picture. B+.

AT THE TIVOLI

Jack Holt with Lilian Miles in Man Against Woman

Jack Holt as "Johnnie" plays the part of the cool, calculating detective to perfection, but he is the only member of the cast whom one can really admire. Lillian Miles as Lola, the night club singer with whom Johnnie is in love reduces the show to a farce on two occasions whilst rendering in a strangulated contralto, her "number." Lola is in love with Charlie who was mixed up in a hold up and Johnnie (who incidently never carries a gun) has the satisfaction of arresting and convicting Charlie and thus satisfying his jealousy.

During the journey by train to the prison, Lola succeeds in helping Charlie to escape.

After losing his man thus, Johnnie refuses to leave the case and due to neglect in another matter he is fired from the force. Meanwhile Charlie is offered a job in Bermuda by Lola's former employer, the head of a rum-running organization. Charlie cheats the books and makes a lot of money.

His chief discovers this and persuades the deposed Johnnie to go after him and fetch him back. Johnny accepts the offer and fetches Lola and Johnnie back for the gang, and then proceeded to foil the gang's attempt to "bump him off" by having a convoy of motorcycle "Cops" to escort the car containing himself and his "would-be" murderess to the police station.

The whole gang is convicted; Lola, however, is freed on parole and, of course, Johnnie marries her so as to be able to keep his eye on her all the time.

The plot is upheld by a perfect orgy of double-crossing but beyond that, it is slight and the acting other than the performance of Jack Holt is mediocre.

French Writers Knock Exploits Of Aviatrix

Paris — Amy Johnson Mollison's recent record-smashing flights between London and Cape Town have brought only grudging praise from Frenchmen, who are concerned over the possibility of French women becoming infected with the virus of feminine athletic fever.

J. H. Rosney, member of the Goncourt Academy, feels that such performances as those of Mrs. Mollison and Amelia Earhart Putnam would endanger a French woman's feminine charm. "Masculinization of the woman," he writes in a current periodical, "is against the dictates of nature and of organized society."

Henri Falk, noted French writer, likewise "views with alarm," but is inclined to adopt a more humorous tone in his comment. He is mainly concerned with the decreasing prestige of husband under the "new woman" system. He envisages the modern woman remarking:

"Leon, I love you and will marry you, but you must realize that I am a parachute jumper. You must let me jump whenever I want. Otherwise, nothing doing."

Taschereau Sees Need For Careful Immigration Policy

tion to the rapid growth of Vancouver and the possibility that the diversion of grain to the westward terminal port might have serious consequences for Montreal. The Premier, however, stated that though the phenomenal development of Vancouver in recent years has had the effect of making her a serious rival to Montreal as a grain exporting port, partly as a result of the opening of the Panama Canal, he was not of the opinion that this competition is likely to prove dangerous to Montreal.

Further queries as to the need for reducing freight rates, raised the question of the St. Lawrence Waterways project. The Premier confessed that he was unable to understand what advantages this scheme would bring. "I can see no benefit that is likely to accrue," he said. "Water power?" "Even that is a doubtful point. As for the expenditure involved, it is far too heavy." The Premier expressed his regret that such an unnecessary burden should be contemplated by the Federal Government, especially at the present time. The Churchill venture was cited as an example of imprudent expenditure, and the Premier pointed out that the railway built at great expense in response to the clamour from the western farmers seems likely to prove a very unprofitable undertaking."

"Would you agree that the value of sentiment in economic relations has been greatly exaggerated in the past few months," I enquired, steering the conversation towards the subject of the Ottawa agreements. "Of course," the Premier admitted, "there is not much sentiment in business." He went on to emphasize that "trade is international and must be treated as such, and referring to some of the idle talk on the topic of favourable balances of trade, "every country can't have a favourable balance of trade," he remarked. In a final word on the Ottawa Treaties he drew attention to the announcement of the lumber deal just concluded between England and Russia. "If the report I read in this morning's paper is correct," he stated, "it will be a serious blow to the Ottawa Pact."

bourhood of 150 volumes, it is learned.

Under such circumstances a change was necessary. In the holidays the books in the Medical Library were moved to a room in the Old Arts Building. In close connection is the Biological Library, and a common reading-room for both. In the room formerly occupied by the Medical Library the books from the reserved shelves have been moved.

In the new system the student must wait his turn and much of the previous confusion has been removed. The record of the books will be complete and during exam. time the student will not be met with the reply, "Sorry, but it has been stolen," as was common before. The change is one for much greater efficiency and follows the method already used by the libraries at McGill and Toronto.

The space recently taken up by the reserved books will be filled with new reference books brought up from the stacks. Many very useful and interesting volumes which, up to the present were little used will in this way be brought to the attention of the students.

Hockey and Student Support

By Sports Editor

With the opening of the hockey seasin only a matter of days away the writer is taking this opportunity of urging all Queen's students to turn out at every game and help the Tricolor teams.

While hockey is a major Canadian sport, Queen's students of recent years have not been at all interested in the fate of their various teams. This was particularly noticeable a few years ago when Queen's Senior B. team were in the finals with Hamilton Tigers and succeeded in downing the latter team in Kingston. Yet only a handful of students turned out to see the game.

In the early days of the fall term, the Track and Field interfaculty meet drew only a hundred odd spectators out, and the students generally shnwed only a luke warm interest in track and field sports.

In other words is Queen's only a one sport college? All our pep is apparently put into one sport only and that of course is rugby. We get the band out, we decorate the frosh, we put on stunts to keep the crowd amused, and when rugby is over we curl up for the winter. There is not good reason why red blooded Canadian students should not pack that Jock Harty arena every time a Queen's team hops the boards, instead of the few who turn out. The cry of depression cannot be given as an excuse for even with tickets paid for in advance, most students shun the rink.

While the A.M.S. is a handy body to blame for almost everything that happens around the university, it isn't too much to say that governing body could do plenty towards putting pep into the hockey games. Perhaps the A.M.S. could explain why the Queen's band is conspicuous by its absence at both hockey and basketball games. Why does that organization put away its instruments when the rugby season is over? Why isn't there a cheer leader on deck for the hockey games? Would it not he a good idea to put as much colour as possible into the games and so encourage not only student attendance, but also Kingston fans. With two ten minute periods available for various stunts to amuse the spectators there is no reason why a senior hockey game at Queen's could not be made into a real evening's entertainment.

It is not difficult to imagine just how much pep and enthusiasm means to a team battling in there for the glory of the university. Queen's hockey teams in past years have had to get along with little more encouragement than they would receive on foreign ice. And it isn't right by gosh, for they are trying to win for Queen's just the same as the rugby teams are.

Well, how about it? With one week to go before the first game, how about a band, a cheerleader, a few stunts on the ice, and a big turnout for the opening battle with Kingston. The A.M.S. should make the first move.

Queen's Juniors Meet Kingston January 11

While the Senior team is endeavoring to win the local group, the Tricolor Junior team will also he going on all sixes to take down the decision from Kingston. The Juniors will play a double schedule with Kingston Juniors for the group championship and they go to the mat on Jan. 11th for the initial struggle.

With the Xmas season also upsetting Junior practices, it is not known yet just who will be found in various positions, but it is no secret that Coach Elmer is very enthusiastic about the team and looks for it to go far. Certificates have been turned in by Wing of Science, McNabb and James, who will try out for goal, Pettit who is no stranger to Queen's fans, and Corrigan and Gibson who played on the Junior Kingston City championship team. There are others out and more will be learned about their chances within a few days.

He: "Of course, you understand dear, that for business reasons our engagement must be kept secret."

She: "Oh, yes, I tell everybody that."

Hockey Practices At Harty Arena Begin

Hockey practices have already started and will continue each day at one o'clock in the Jock Harty Arena. Intercollegiate games with Varsity are on the horizon, but no definite date has been set. In the meantime, year games will be played.

A meeting of the basketball team will be held to-day, and it is expected that practice will commence Monday. The girls have arranged practice games with the Junior hoys' team, and are confident that they will profit much by the experience. All basketball aspirants will be welcomed at the practices.

Intercollegiate Basketball is in the air, and the Women's Meet will be held in February at Montreal. McGill are sponsoring practically the same team as last year, which should give them a good chance to win the coveted Bronze Baby. Varsity have found their team riddled by graduation, and have also lost their coach, Marion Forward. However, there seems to be plenty of material for them to draw on, and they have selected Sally Ballard, star of previous Varsity teams to coach them.

I ORTS SLANTS

Hockey gets the limelight before basketball, and both branches carry Queen's hopes for a trophy.

* * * * * *

Coach Wally Elmer has his hands full sorting out the various players who will make up the Senior "B" team.

After packing away turkey for the past two weeks, perhaps a vegetable diet would not go so badly with the teams.

* * * * * *

Have you seen the gym floor? It's about the only thing around the University that enjoys being walked on.

* * * * * *

Hang up the hockey and basketball schedule where it will be readily spotted and don't forget the home games.

* * * * * *

Let's give the hockey team a break by packing the rink for every game. They'll need it.

B. W. F. Contenders Back Into Training

With Christmas festivities over for another year, the mit and mat boys are once more back in the gym, to shake off the ten days lay off, and get back into condition for the forthcoming assaults.

The last week in January has been set aside for inter-year competition, and the first week in February will see the Interfaculty assault. There will be an exhibition assault with either Toronto or Ottawa at Queen's, some time within the next few weeks, and it is also likely that the boys will make a trip to Ottawa before the Intercollegiate assault, to show the good citizens of the Capital that Queen's is all there.

And then finally, on the 17th and 18th, the Intercollegiate assault will take place at McGill, in good old Montreal, and once more the boys will bring back the cup to Kingston.

QUEEN'S QUILL

Well folks — it's too bad you couldn't take a few Quills home to put in the old family stocking for Christmas after all. The dearth of material and other insignificant, but unavoidable details have at last been conquered and the Queen's Quill will be in your hands on Wednesday, January 11th. You'll find several excellent short stories among which are "C'est la Guerre" by an "unknown soldier", "Way of Escape" by J. H. Bell and "Big Jim" by J. D. Bateman; a short play, a rather brutal treatise on operations for aspiring medicos to absorb, and the usual Book Reviews and "Shreds and Patches." As for poetry—well— words fail us! Mark our words—it's well worth reading.

We have only mentioned a few of the contributions — but we can't bear to tell you all about 'em beforehand! One thing we might draw your attention to is the fact that Miss Gerda Hellmund, the German exchange student from Berlin has written an article on German university life which is, if we may use that execrable word—"darned" good.

So, if you see harassed-looking individuals wandering around our Halls of Learning on Wednes be sure to have your quarters ready. As you buy your Quills, just pat the vendors sympathetically on the head; they DO appreciate a word of encouragement, poor things. And just think of the fun you'll get, showing Quills to your grandchildren.

Senior B. Schedule Assures Brisk Games

Elsewhere will be found a copy of the Senior "B" O.H.A. schedule, and a perusal of it will reveal the fact that hockey enthusiasts will not have long to wait before the referee's bell sends the teams in the local group on their way.

The group will be composed of four strong teams, with Queen's, Gananoque, R.M.C. and Kingston, striving for honours, and it can be depended upon to produce stirring struggles for there is always plenty of rivalry when Kingston, Queen's and R.M.C. mix.

Belleville used to provide the fireworks and their withdrawal this year means that a lot of colour will be absent from the battles.

Gananoque, always a hard battling town has jumped up from Intermediate ranks and promised to put the seaport town on the hockey map, and they have some good players to back up their promises. Just how good they are will not be known until the teams have met but from this angle it looks as if the students will see some worthwhile struggles.

R.M.C. are an unknown aggregation this year, but they are always represented hy a team of fighters, who never know when they are licked, and if they do not win the local group it will not be for want of trying. They lost many of their stars of last year, but the addition of a few clever newcomers has boosted their rating and they look for results.

The fans of Kingston have had a few eyefuls watching the City League, the Limestone fans are emphatic in their statements that they can produce a team that will clean up on the rest of the group. But that remains to be seen.

Coach Wally Elmer had the Tricolor squad going great guns before the Turkey season, and would undoubtedly have made real progress had not the advent of exams. and Xmas intervened. The layoff didn't help the squad a bit and it will take some peppy grinds to put them in shape for the opening game. On Wednesday about eight made their appearance, and by the end of the week all should be on deck battling for positions. And they will need to go for the opening game is scheduled for Jan. 13th.

Just who will comprise the team is not known even to Coach Elmer as yet, but he looks for a strong team to face the opening bell. While no positions are decided it looks as if "Danny Daniels will guard the twine. He went over big last year with the Intermediates and should have a good season. Bill Carr, and Patterson are available from last year's team, and Storms should make the rest hustle to catch places. A few of those already out are Ross Simpson, a Med. Frosh, "Sock" Smith of Paris Intermediate fame. Matheson, an Arts Frosh, Kostnik who is well known, Jack Murphy of 3rd year Meds., and Champaigne, and Sheppard of last year's Junior team. All who are interested are urged to turn out without delay and get into shape.

Book Chats

By R.M.

For this semester we intend to adopt a new policy in this column: the consideration of a number of novels that are acknowledged classics. In other words we have been weaned from an infantile predilection for plebian literature, and, without any ulterior motive, have become animated with a desire to evangelize for "high-browism." The reason? There is none we assure you; except that it seems a pity to let the virulent attack of a recent writer in a prominent quarterly go unchallenged. In brief, he claimed that the modern generation has no interest in, or appreciation of Sir Walter Scott's Novels. A sad state of affairs, indeed; and one which will have to be remedied.

Certain novelists, Scott not excepted, seem to be "anreoled with a pseudo-sanctity;" they are revered because of their sterling worth, or their prodigious industry. Symptomatic of this attitude is the belief that a well-read man ought to have read such and such a book. Some of us, in an effort to escape this onerous moral obligation, have passed up many of Scott's novels and those of other famous authors, only to find, at some point in our life history, that these books are really, humanly interesting. This discovery is made in spite of all the diverse factors of age, manners, and increased tempo of living that militate against the appreciation of the hectic days when knighthood was in flower. For after all, it is a mental feat to abstract oneself from the now, (the age in which we live), and focus the spotlight on part of the continuum of events known as the past.

Ivanhoe contains much that should appeal to the modern generation. Turgid in style and overdocumented it may be, yet it radiates human interest, quickens the pulses with swift moving action, and delights the mind's eye with picturesque descriptions of Norman England in the twelfth century. After one wades through fifty pages or so of introductory matter, the wandering senses seem to become mobilized; concentration is elicited without effort and the story moves on apace.

Chapter VII. describes the tournament in which Ivanhoe jousts right merrily with the pick of the Norman Knights; and as in a modern thriller he is rescued at the crucial moment by the Black Knight (Richard, Coeur de Lion). This scene and the one describing the siege of De Bracy's castle are set forth with a vigour and fidelity that breathes the spirit of reality. Such deeds of daring may "appeal to the boy in us" as Brander Matthews asserts, but what of it? Let's have more of them. After all the robust aspects of chivalry are infinitety superior to a decadent realism—a morbidly introspective psychology.

True, the characterization in Ivanhoe is not remarkable for individuality in its portraitures nor for penetrating analysis of motive. The hero is a full-blooded, "one hundred per cent He man;" the villain or villains maintain their surly, domineering tone. Lady Rowena, Rebecca and the other females in the book are colourless women, addicted to fainting, kidnapping, and quixotic flights of ecstasy. In connection with Rowena Scott speaks of "the profusion of her sable tresses" which reminds me somewhat of a mythical mermaid or a damsel from the South Seas. Evidently, Scott didn't know his women. With these few deprecatory remarks, however, we have noted the most objectionable features of Ivanhoe. Unreal it may be, but intensely interesting it certainly is, even in this fast moving age.

HOW TO GET FIRED

Boston—Here are a few hints on getting fired.

If you're a banker or an insurance man—try being tardy or discourteous.

Perhaps you're in the publishing business—poor selling will do the trick.

But the easiest way to get fired is—be careless.

H. Chandler Hunt, assistant principal of Meriden High School, Meriden, Conn., and a graduate student at the Boston University School of Education, listed the above after a survey of seventy-six business concerns, covering every type of industry and employing 49,854 clerical workers.

Hunt reported his survey revealed there is an average turnover of 5.8 per cent of clerical workers. Approximately 4,000 Hunt reported, were discharged yearly in the concerns studied.

"Carelessness is the outstanding reason for involuntary termination of employment," Hunt said.

SPOONERS PARADISE

Mexico City — Chief of police Guillermo Palma Moreno believes women should have equal rights with men in the enjoyment of Mexican moonlight and that spooners should be unmolested.

The chief has ordered all policemen not to question or molest unescorted women strolling along a street or sitting on a park bench, no matter what the hour of the night. It was reported to the chief that some policemen were demanding money from lone women under threat of arrest.

"Men roam the streets at all hours of the night and are not molested, so why should women be bothered?" General Moreno asked.

The chief also ordered that spooners in parks and plazas be unmolested by the gendarmerie. The press hailed the order as "a removal of metropolitan life from the relics of an old moral order and attuning it to the rhythm of modern times."

It has been found, by a recent survey, that there are more people in penal institutions than there are in educational institutions.

Pictures Moved Out Of Convocation Hall

For some years the wall space of Convocation Hall has been covered with portraits and tablets, but the use made of the hall by the Faculty Players and the Queen's Dramatic Guild indicated that the paintings could not be hung over the platform without possibility of injury. The Executive Committee of the University appointed in November a special committee consisting of Principal Fyfe, Dr. J. C. Connell, and Judge H. A. Lavell to consider the re-arrangement of portraits.

In accordance with the report of the committee the following changes have been made. The tablet to the memory of members of the Theological College killed in the war has been moved to the Chapel of the Theological College. The portraits of Dr. McKerras, Dr. Dupuis, Dr. Cappon, Mr. Morris and Dr. Watson have been hung in the Arts Faculty Room. The paintings of Principal Grant, Sir Sandford Fleming, Principal Liddell and Dr. Williamson have been moved to the east and west walls of Convocation Hall and those of Dr. Jordan, G. M. Macdonnell, Judge Macdennan, Principal Taylor and Dr. Goodwin have been hung under the gallery. The Medical Advisory Committee is in charge of the portraits of Drs. Fenwick, Saunders and J. C. Connell. The other paintings have been placed on the walls of the corridor on the second floor of the Old Arts Building.

Noted Queen's Quarterback Marries Western Graduate

A Christmas wedding of great interest to students of Queen's took place in St. Cecelia's Church, Toronto, when Mary Reddick, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. B. C. Reddick of Chatham, became the bride of Gratton Mungovan, son of Mrs. Dennis Mungovan of Toronto. The bride is a graduate of Western University and the groom of Queen's University. 'Ga" Mungovan is well-known in Kingston and on Queen's campus, for he is a former Queen's rugby star, and later starred with the Argos. Mr. Mungovan was also at one time Sports Editor of the Queen's Journal, where he displayed great abiliiy.

On their return from a trip to Montreal, Mr. and Mrs. Mungovan will reside in Toronto.

Names Of Tricolor Debaters Announced

The team to represent Queen's in the forthcoming intercollegiate debates has been announced and is as follows: Eric Gilmour, John Parker, Phil Stuchen, Harold McLean.

The motion to be debated is "That this House approves Japan's activities in Manchuria." Eric Gilmour and John Parker will take the affirmatice side here at Queen's against Ottawa University, and Phil Stuchen and Harold McLean will travel to Montreal to represent the negative side against Loyola.

The debates, both at home and away, will take place on Friday, Feb. 12th.

Exchange Scholarships Open To Queen's Students

ships may be awarded only where a student of one university wishes to obtain a scholarship at a university in a different "division." This is subject to one exception —Ontario students may apply for scholarships to French-Canadian universities in Quebec for the purpose of taking special studies in the French language and vice versa.

Any student may apply if he is, at the time of his application, in the second year of his course or, in the case of five years courses, in the second or third year. It is a condition of each appointment that the Exchange Scholar must return, at the conclusion of his scholarship year to complete his course at his "home" University. Consequently a Sophomore taking the usual four-year Arts course may be awarded a scholarship for his third year; in the case of five-year courses the scholarship may be awarded either for the third or fourth year.

An Exchange Scholar is expected to be a representative student of his "home" University in every way. It is not necessary that he should have a first-class academic standing but he must be a competent student who will be able to enter freely into the life of the "exchange" University without fear of class-room consequences.

About fifty students have received Exchange Scholarships during the past four years. This year a total of seven are enjoying the privileges of the Exchange Plan—two at McGill, two at Dalhousie, two at Alberta, and one at Toronto. In most cases the saving in tuition fees more than balances the transportation costs involved. Applications must be handed in to the N.F.C.U.S. representative before March 1st, 1933..

Ticket Sale For Ban Righ At Homes Begins To-day

The sale of tickets for the two Ban Righ "At Homes", which are being held on the nights of Jan. 18th and 20th, begins to-day, and all reports lead us to expect a bigger and better sale than ever before. Doreen Kenny, convener of the committee in charge, has announced that originality is the key-note this year, and that the arrangements of the capable committee will render Ban Righ Hall irresistible to disciples of the polished floor. The ingenuity of the girls has devised a scheme of decoration which will completely disguise Ban Righ Hall, and transform it into a place of beauty for all those who are wise enough to get their tickets early and avoid the rush.

Hart House Quartet To Play Here Jan. 13

On Friday, January 13th, Grant Hall is once again to be the scene of a recital presented by the Hart House String Quartet. This concert has been made possible by the Massey Foundation and all students are urged to keep this date free. For the benefit of those who have not previously had the pleasure of hearing this quartet, the Journal reminds them that the Hart House musicians enjoy great popularity throughout the country. On the occasion of their last visit to Kingston they played to a capacity house and will be welcomed again next week with anticipation.

All students and those otherwise connected with Queen's University will be admitted without tickets. Those outside the College may obtain tickets free of charge on asking for them at Grinham's Book Store, or Uglow's on Princess St.

Plans For Annual Arts At Home Maturing Rapidly

The Journal learns from an Arts Formal Committeeman that preparations for the big event are proceeding satisfactorily. Several members of the committee have been active throughout the vacation and as a result most of the plans are now ready to be put into action.

The tickets will go on sale the first of next week and will be in charge of Ken Heath and Art Hall. Decorations are to be supervised by Bob Johnston, who is being assisted by Don Neville in creating design and lighting effect.

Although the formal is still three weeks away (January 27) current inquiries indicate a record demand for tickets. Those intending to be present are advised to act soon and avoid the disappointment of being unable to secure admission.

"So many men marry for money," she said. "Your wouldn't marry me for money, would you Harry."

"No," said Harry, absently. "I wouldn't marry you for all the money in the world."

And he's wondering why he got his engagement ring back.

Queen's Quill To Be Put On Sale Early To-Morrow

Periodical Contains Articles And Stories Of Interest To All

The long awaited second number of the Queen's Quill will make its appearance to-morrow, it was officially announced yesterday.

All arrangements have been made to meet the large demand that is anticipated. The circulation department has made the necessary preparations to sell the Quill at various vantage points around the campus. Copies will be on sale in the Library, the Students' Union, and Ban Righ Hall; temporary selling agencies will also be established in the New Arts Building, the Old Arts Building, the Anatomy Building, the Richardson Laboratory, and several of the Science Buildings. It is also expected that the Technical supplies and the Tuck Shop in the Union will carry a supply.

"The low price (25c) at which the Quill is being sold," explained the Editor of the magazine to a Journal man yesterday, "makes it necessary for us to ensure the largest possible circulation, and enlist the widest support of the student body." "I have no doubt," Mr. Gilmour added, "that the quality of the latest issue of the Quill will ensure its immediate popularity and further enhance its reputation."

The Journal learns that the new Quill contains a number of stimulating articles, stories and verse contributions likely to please the most varied tastes and the most discriminatiug judgment.

A number of posters announcing the full details of publication were placed around the campus yesterday.

Arts '33 Plan Spree To-Morrow Evening

Don't forget that on Wednesday night Arts '33 are planning to hold their annual spree—where? At the La Salle of course, and Bob Warmington will furnish the music. We have special entertainers for the evening, too! Bill Gummer, who needs no introduction will play for us, and Misses Irma Reynolds and Jessie Kiele will show us how to tap dance.

Don't forget it — dancing from 9-1, and the price is only $1.25. Buy your tickets early from the committeeé Don McCaig (convener), Doug Muir, Snds Sutherland, Eileen McFarland and Jo Tett.

An exceedingly popular musical program has been prepared for this gala event. Nothing has been overlooked by the capable executive to make this a high-spot in the social swirl which is taking the campus by storm, and everyone is assured of a most enjoyable time. The patrons and patronesses of this event are Dean and Mrs. Matheson, Prof. and Mrs. Mackintosh.

Natural History Club To Hear G. Toner

To Discuss Mammals And Museum Methods

The next meeting of the Natural History Club will be on Thursday, Feb. 12th, 1933, and the speaker will he Mr. G. C. Toner. The smaller Mammals of the province form a very interesting group of various orders. They are not a homogeneous group but comprise some of the most interesting natural history subjects. Considerable work has been done in the past few years by the museum workers and others. Mr. Toner will give a description of methods of preparing museum specimens and something about the mammals in the field.

"Nothing That Really Profits A Man Is Followed With Some Ulterior Motive"

Dalhousie President Tells News Editor

"Nothing that really profits a man is followed with an ulterior motive," remarked President Stanley of Dalhousie University, discussing the value of unspecialized university courses with a Journal representative yesterday. Dr. Stanley expressed the opinion that for probably the great majority of students a general course offered the best opportunity for determining into what field their later career ought to carry them. Then an Arts course for example gave the undergraduate a chance "to peer into a number of pigeon-holes", and find out which one held the key to the proper avenue of future endeavour.

"Many students coming into college, want to keep as many doors open as possible," Dr. Stanley continued. The specialized technical course is often a pitfall to them because they are uncertain as to what they really want to do. If, for instance they consider taking a special course in Commerce, how are they to know that they want to do that and nothing else? The general course offers them a means of making up their minds as to the future.

"You are not in favour then of the movement in recent years towards greater specialization in education?" he was asked.

"I think there will be a swing back in the other direction," Dr. Stanley replied, and then when asked his opinion of the value of the Commerce course for a business career, he added, "Everything I know about any particular department of business forces me to believe that it is so very specialized that I can't conceive of any course that would do you any good for it." Dr. Stanley then went on to explain that he did not mean by this that he was opposed to specialized courses for certain students; but primarily such courses as medicine and engineering, to quote but two examples, were intended for undergraduates who knew what vocation they desired to follow in after life, thought it was also true that any study which imposed a healthy mental discipline and trained the observation was going to help the student in his career.

Dr. Stanley expressed regret at the number of students who entered the university not for an education in the true meaniug of the term, but only for the sake of a degree, which could be commercialized after they left college.

Levana At Home

Members of Levana are reminded that tickets for the Levana At-Homes are now on sale everyday in the Red Room between lectures, and in Ban Righ Hall immediately after lunch and dinner. If the sale of tickets does not reach the maximum, the ticket list will be opened to Graduates so undergraduates are urged to buy tickets early. They may he obtained from Elizabeth Cameron.

Arts Society Will Hold Novel Party

The Arts Society plans a novel entertainment for this afternoon, when its first meeting in 1933 will be held.

Despite previous notices that have appeared around the campus it is now officially announced that the meeting will occur in Room 201 of the New Arts Building and from there will afterwards adjourn to the Arts Club Room to play bridge.

This part of the programme is the especial contribution of Arts '33 who will be in charge of the meeting. The Journal learns that every one who wishes to play bridge is expected to bring with him one, or, if possible, two, packs of cards. It is expected that there will be a large attendance.

At Home Committee Hires Popular Band

Plans Of Committee Progressing Rapidly

This is a dramatic news story about a big event in the history of the Arts Formal Dance of 1933. The information contained herein is believed to be accurate but we do not guarantee it.

The Arts Formal Committee have long been determined to equal or surpass anything in the way of entertainment attempted on the campus. Negotiations with Wright Brothers orchestra of Strathroy were complete and everybody happy. The contract was confirmed from Kingston by letter and by wire and the convener returned to his dream of home, happiness and hilarity (this can only be experienced before and during the year-end exams).

And it came to pass (with permission of Steam Shovel) that there came unto this calm city a veritable bombshell. The convener lost his hair, weight and reputation on reading a telegram from Western Ontario informing him that the evening of January 27th had long ago been booked by the Wright Orchestra and what would we do about it. The committee did plenty. They swore (as only committee men can), they wailed, they frothed at the mouth, went into a trance, turned somersaults and, in general, had a hectic session. With exams popping in front of them, behind them and around them, on to the valley of death rode the six hundred.

So after due consultation with the Canadian National Telegraphs, Western Union, Bell Telephone and associated companies, and the Postmaster General, and after umpteen conferences had been called the committee had the pleasant feeling of disbanding for the holidays with all the decorations, food, novel-

Queen's Sleuths Disprove Ancient Adage By Finding Lost Radium Needle In Incinerator

Successfully ending their search for the $600 radium needle which was missing after a recent operation at the Kingston General Hospital, Stewart Marshal, B.A., of the Queen's Department of Physics and Sam McNeight, M.Sc., of the Chemical Laboratory, Queen's University, located the valuable needle in the city incinerator, and so had their efforts crowned with success on Sunday morning after a hard hunt lasting for five days.

The instrument which aided in the search is called an electroscope and is the property of the Physics Department. This instrument is able to detect the presence of radium within 10 feet. The instrument itself is a five-inch square brass box. A wire passes through the top of the box and suspends a sulphur plug to which is attached a rod and a leaf. The rod and leaf are kept charged by the sulphur plug which acts as an insulator. In searching for radium, the rod and leaf are charged. When radium rays enter the walls of the box they make the air a conductor and cause the leaf to lose its charge and drop. The motion of the leaf is visible through a small glass window on a side of the box.

The loss of the radium needle had been discovered last Tuesday and search was at once began. The most probable solution was that it had been discarded with bandages used during the operation. This theory was followed and the city incenerators and ash dumps were searched. A furnace fire in the incenerator gave indications of the presence of radium, and when the fire was let out the small 1¼ inch needle was located among the ashes by means of the electroscope. The radium needles are the personal property of Dr. Frederick Etherington and are used by him for special operations.

"What Is The Use Of Knowledge If No One Is To Heed Wisdom?" Queries First Extension Speaker

"Knowledge In A Vacuum," Topic Of Visiting President Of Dalhousie At Opening Lecture Of Annual Extension Series Programme.

"What use is knowledge if none are to heed wisdom?" was the substance of an address given by Dr. Carleton Stanley, President of Dalhousie University, at the first extension lecture delivered in Convocation Hall yesterday afternoon at 5 p.m. The lecture entitled, "Knowledge in a Vacuum," was broadcast by CFRC, the Queen's radio station. Principal Fyfe occupied the chair.

Continuing, Dr. Stanley said, "Be sceptical of humanity's latest slogan, but tolerant of humanity, and remember that there is still as much comedy in life as tragedy." "It was said long ago," continued Dr. Stanley, "that theorizing, speculation, the enjoyment of knowledge for its own sake, was the divinest and happiest existence of which man was capable. Either the philosopher must be made King, or the King must be made philosopher. And it followed soon after this that Knowledge of any kind, no matter how quietly it was pursued, was viewed with suspicion, and that science after science began to perish."

So far as that particular chapter of history is concerned then, it would seem that when Knowledge does not result in action the day is not far distant when there will be no Knowledge among men at all. It is further worthy of remark that in that age those who knew were perfectly willing to teach—indeed Knowledge has never perhaps been so eloquent since, as it was in that age. It must have been, therefore, that too few were willing to learn. At any rate the younger of the two men I have quoted says somewhere that a wise man learns more from a fool than a fool learns from a wise man.

"I suppose that the career of J. M. Keynes, during the last fourteen years, is as good an example of continuous sound thinking as history shows. At the same time, unfortunately, it is an almost unparalleled example of Knowledge in a vacuum, of prophecies and warnings unheeded even when inch by inch and month by month his earlier prophecies were proving true. This is the more remarkable

Drama Guild Play To Star Collegians

Martha Johnson And Lee Browne In Leads

Three of Queen's Dramatic Guild Players have prominent roles in the Drama Group of the Kingston Art and Music Club's play "March Hares" which is being produced at the Technical Auditorium Tuesday, January 17th at 8.15 by Mrs. John Goodfellow.

Martha Johnson who has appeared in several Guild productions and who is best remembered for her work in "Holiday," and "Baa Baa Black Sheep" plays the leading feminine role of Janet Rodney.

Arthur Sutherland who plays opposite Miss Johnson in the role of Geoffrey Warham has also appeared in several Guild plays namely "Maria Marten," "The Valiant" and "Gammer Gurten's Needle."

Lee Williams Browne one of the Guild's most versatile players plays the part of Claudia Kilts. Mrs. Browne has had feature roles in all of the Guild's longer plays for the past three years.

Special student tickets in the balcony for a quarter may be obtained at the door or the University Post Office.

This is an excellent opportunity of spending a pleasant evening, enjoying an interesting play, produced and acted by capable performers.

Levana Meeting

The Levana Society will hold their January meeting on Thursday, January 12th at 7 o'clock in the Common Room of Ban Righ Hall. The guest speaker will be Mr. Gleb Krotkov who will speak on "An Immigrant's Impressions of America." It is also expected that Mrs. Gregory Vlastos will be present and will give a short address on Religion in Personal Life.

Refreshments will be served.

Union Again Ready To Serve Faithfully

The Union is away with a good start for 1933, the Dining room being as popular as ever.

The Billiard room has come in for special attention. The Tables have been overhauled, floor sanded and polished, and linoleum laid around each table. Certainly the Janitor and his Assistant are to be congratulated on an excellent job. The Warden is hopeful that the students will be proud of their Billiard room and will see to it that it is used and not abused.

The Cafeteria, beginning Tuesday 10th January, will be open from 10 to 11 p.m., each evening (Saturday and Sunday excepted) when light lunches will be served at very moderate rates. This should prove a convenience to students. By the way it may be of interest to know that all milk used in the Union is pasteurized and is from a Government certified herd, Government Inspected Diary with an up-to-date pasteurizing plant.

Work For Everyone

Far from the noise, bustle, suffering and misery of city life, a small band of courageous men and women is to-day engaged in a long, ruthless and determined struggle with Nature to eke out a living from the soil of wild Temiscaminque, in Northern Quebec.

Valiant French-Canadian unemployed are gathered there from all cities of the Province of Quebec. In the cities merciless depression with its attendant evils forced them out of their jobs, forced them to seek subsistance on city welfare benevolence, and prolonged economic disorder lent catastrophic background to a black picture. Civic officials realized they could not continue everlastingly to support the workless. A "Back to the Land" movement was instituted, and this new settlement in Northern Quebec is the first tangible result of this campaign for unemployment relief.

The "défricheurs" as we may well call them, have named their settlement "La Rivière Salutaire." There are about one hundred families there at the time of writing, but the population is rapidly increasing, both by the process of immigration and the work of the trusty stork.

The settlement is miles from any railway station, the dog-sled being the only means of transportation at present. From the few reports which have emanated from "La Rivière Salutaire", everyone is happy and this new life is greatly to be preferred to the former dreary, half-starved existences in the misery-ridden cities. The greatest need at present is for a doctor. The work of directing activities has fallen to a priest, who is, as well, the spiritual adviser, medicine-man, entertainer, and captain of the settlement. The only other existing need is for wives for the unmarried males, but this has become so pronounced that many newspapers have carried stories to this effect, and have made known to the female reading public the qualifications of the eligible male "défricheurs". Needless to say only strong, sturdy girls who are not afraid of work need apply.

Realizing that the reclaiming of forested land for agriculture is a slow and tedious process, the Government of the Province of Quebec has done, and is doing all in its power to facilitate their work, and to assure them sustenance during the unproductive period that the settlement must experience of necessity. Thus a Government provision post has been set up and each family is supplied with $15.00 worth of food every month without charge.

Theory after theory has been advanced in attempts to hit at the cause of this world-wide economic upheaval and to provide an expedient form its ravages. But they have proved to be but ephemeral dreams of well-wishing economists. They have ever exhibited the veneer of the class-room, of resplendent offices on Wall Street, and of the luxuriously furnished offices of Parliament buildings. Time has shown these theories to be but alibis of self-styled prophets.

It is our belief that the "Back to the Land" campaign is the first effective solution to the economic readjustment—though we are too well aware that it is but a partial solution.

The day of theories is over. This is the day for concentrated action.

Dr. Einstein Signs A Contract

Dr. Albert Einstein will teach in the United States. He has recently signed a contract to become one of the leaders of the newly formed Institute for Advanced Study. He has been offered luxurious freedom for study and recreation, and all the money he cares to have.

Dr. Einstein, a little German-Jew, and probably the greatest mathematical and philosophical thinker of the age, was the son of an obscure Jewish merchant. But he grew up to think, and as he thought, the wisdom and incandescent brilliance of his reflections and calculations was brought to the light of scientific observers.

His fame spread little by little. Academic, rather than poetic, he was acclaimed in the field of science rather in that of philosophy, in which he undoubtedly is no amateur. He thought for himself, and out of that brain which defied the code of centuries sprang an entirely new idea of the cosmic materialism of things, an idea so dazzling that it is claimed that there are but a handful of men who clearly comprehend its theory.

Acclaimed by the leaders, the mob have taken up the cry of his praises. The very mention of his name brings the connotation of immense wisdom, withal immersed in a great yet obscure ass of technicalities. Not in life is Albert Einstein obscure and involved. A simple, quiet man, the rest of the world has found him out and forced the burden of great notoriety on his erstwhile peaceful studies.

It is as Emerson said, "A man may live in a cabin in the depths of the woods, but if he builds a better mouse trap than his neighbor, the world will make a beaten path to his door."—Oregon Emerald.

Mr. Jekyll And Mrs. Hyde

"Women are angels," cried a world, steeped in its idealistic concept of a creature, "pure, sincere and fragile, impractical but to be considered with utmost awe."

Then came Kipling with his "a rag, a bone, a hank of hair," Schopenhauer's short, narrow-shouldered, broad-hipped, short-legged monstrosity; Nietzsche's "women for the diversion of the warrior," and Chesterfield's view of woman as children.

Men early realized the inaccuracy of both the old and the new concepts, and changing conditions brought the same realization to the women themselves. While they lived the role of complimentary but rather useless organisms, insulated from cares of business, they were able to maintain the angelic aura. But the briskness and intimacy of their contact with the world today has revealed that women have dimensions, feelings and capacities like other human individuals.

As a result, many women try to live up to both concepts at once. They employ a dual personality, shifting disconcertingly from the soft-voiced Victorian to the hard-lipped, calculating modern. A Minnesota professor tells the story of a girl who wept in his class while reading a romantic selection. "Oh!" she cried, "they gave up everything for love!" Her professor tested her: "Would you go to the Common peepul's ball with a boy you liked very much or to the Junior prom with a mere acquaintance?" The tears stopped, the eyes brightened, "That's different! Of course I'd go to the prom!"

as Mr. Keynes, unlike most unheeded prophets has not grown sour, nor urged any importunate "I-told-you-so's". He shows still an imperturbable good humour, and still looks forward, not back.

Most will remember that Mr. Keynes predicted, almost from the time of its publication, that the Treaty of Versailles was an economic impossibility. That was not just a stroke of original genius. Few of the thinkers of Europe believed that the Treaty was either wise or feasible. But it was left for Mr. Keynes to set forth his belief in marshalled comprehensive argument, in which no phase of the matter was overlooked, and in a masterpiece of English prose, while others, amidst nation-wide hatreds and in deference to the whim of the mob, were content to hide behind a wall till the storm was by.

But Keynes showed his divination into things by still keeping clear the difference between economic survey and practical advice, and the still greater difference between giving practical advice and getting things done. The first number of the Supplements was devoted to the stabilising of the Exchange (it was early in 1922). Keynes' first paragraph of the introduction is on the sad difference between chemists, mathematicians, physicians and astronomers on the one hand, and economists on the other.

> "If it were krypton, harmonies, kidneys, or nebulae we sought to stabilise, we should contemplate the best plan and carry it out to scientific conclusion, without ever troubling to make it clear to you, my intelligent but unscientific friends, the readers of this article. But an economist must be humble. He cannot accomplish except by persuasion.

It was about this time, in another bit of writing, that Keynes demonstrated by arithmetic that it was costing Washington more to put gold under ground than it was British engineers to extract the same gold from mines a mile and a half deep in South Africa.

However, neither the Bank of England nor the Federal Reserve Board accepted the advice so humbly offered to them. For one thing they had the politicians always with them.

Luck and Examination Grades

There is much difference of opinion among teachers as to the value of final examinations. Some teachers base the grade given upon their impression of the students' work. They are distrustful of the examination as a reliable measure of the students grasp of the subject matter. At the other extreme some feel that their judgment may be prejudiced and try to avoid being unfair by placing sole reliance upon a written examination.

Let us assume that we have 100 students who have mastered 90 per cent. of the material they should have covered in a certain course. If we give them an examination consisting of only one question chosen at random, and if this question is of such a type that the right answer can not be guessed at successfully, then there are only two possible grades, 100 per cent. and zero. According to the law of probabilities, we should expect about 90 of the 100 students to get 100 per cent. and about 10 to get zero. Suppose now that we give an examination consisting of two questions. There are now three possible grades: 100 per cent., 50 per cent., and zero. The terms of the binomial expansion, $100\ (.9+.1)^2=81+18+1$, give the theoretical numbers that should fall in each group, 81 getting 100 per cent, 18 getting 50 per cent, and 1 getting zero. The actual proportions falling into each group would not necessarily equal these proportions in any particular trial, but over a large number of trials they would closely approach these theoretical proportions. Notice that the two question examination is incapable of disclosing that there is such a thing as a 90 per cent. student.

To extend our compulations to include cases with a greater number of questions we use the binomial expansion, $P_m=\frac{N}{m!(N-m)!}\times .9_m \times .1\ (N-m)$ where Pm represents the probability of getting a grade of m per cent on an examination of N questions.

If by this means we extend our argument to include the 50 per cent. student, and the 70 per cent. student, as well as the 90 per cent. student; and increase the number of unit questions, chosen at random, to a 100, we obtain some idea of the magnitude of the gain in accuracy.

These figures also reveal an interesting fact; that the spread of grades is greater for the poorer students. This bears out the observation made in practice when poor students are allowed to take another examination: if enough special examinations are given the student will finally be lucky enough to make a passing grade. A numerical measure of the spread of a distribution of students in the probable error in grade. The following table gives some idea of the magnitude of this error.

PROBABLE ERROR IN GRADE

No of Questions	50 Per cent Student	70 Per cent Student	90 Per cent Student
10 Questions	10.7%	9.8%	6.4%
100	3.4	3.1	2.0

The figure of 2.0 per cent. for the 90 per cent student on a 100 question examination means that half of a large number of 90 per cent students may be expected to get between 88 per cent and 92 per cent. It is of interest to note that if the 100 question examination is of the true-false type this probable error increases to 2.9 per cent.

The following table summarizes the effect of the element of chance on the grades received by 1,000 students of each type on examinations of 10, 20 or 100 qustions:

	Number of Students Receiving Grade of
	A (95-100)	B (85-95)	C (75-84)	D (70-74)	Fd Below 70
1,000-50% Students
10-question exam.	1	10	44	117	828
20-question exam.		1	19	37	943
100-question exam.					1,000
1,000-70% Students
10-question exam.	28	121	233	267	351
20-question exam.	8	99	309	192	392
100-question exam.		1	163	386	450
1,000-90% Students
10-question exam.	349	387	194	57	13
20-question exam.	392	475	112	9	12
100-question exam.	58	903	39

Of the thousand 50 per cent students, all of whom should fail, 172 will pass a 10 question examination and 57 will pass a 20 question examination. On the 100 question examination it is pretty certain that all of them will fail.

The 70 per cent student is right on the dividing line. If it were possible to determine his standing exactly he should get a D, but on each of the three examinations his chance of failing is large. On a 20 question examination 16 out of every hundred will get a C, but 45 may be expected to fail. In the gamble for grades the 70 per cent student has the odds against him.

The 90 per cent student stands squarely in the middle of the B group, yet on the 10 and 20 question examinations he has almost as good a chance to get an A, though he runs a small chance of falling below B. On the 100 question examination he stands a good chance of getting the grade he deserves. On the whole, the odds rather favor the 90 per cent student.

Due to the assumptions that it was necessary to make to be able to compete the probabilities mathematically, the results cannot be said to be accurate and exact, but they do give an idea of the magnitude of the variations to be expected, and provide an argument against the fraction of a per cent grading system that some teachers use.

Calendar Chasing Is Excellent Exercise

One of the chaps at our house is going to enter a seven-day bicycle race. James and I were ordered to procure a calendar—one with a nice picture on it. We sallied forth. A freshman told us that we could get a calendar at the University, but as it lacked pictures we threw it away and went in search of the freshman. We found him and left the blighter in one of the museum cases in Miller Hall. See this latest acquisition to the University collection of freaks. It is absolutely unique.

From Miller Hall we hastened down street before the Janitor could chase us out of the elevator. Eighty-one shops and offices did we visit and only seven times were our enquiries for calendars successful. In many offices we discovered no calendars, but we saw some stenographers (good lookers too) we would like to see on them. We respectfully suggest that the University enliven their annual publication with a reproduction in colour of one of these fair young things. Now, on King street for instance . . . .

After many failures and one successful attempt in which we acquired a yellow sheet on which was depicted a large bottle which James at first took for a crock of Gin, but which proved to be a bottle of cod liver oil, James suggested that our attempts were doomed because our technique was poor. Said he, "No wonder we aren't getting anywhere. We need a system. Now let me do the talking this time. You pipe down."

We sauntered into an automobile dealer's establishment. I piped down. James took charge and walking up to a big car on the floor he gave the tire a swift kick and remarked. "Nice car, eh?"

I nodded and the salesman rushed forth to sell us one of his gangrene coloured monstrosities and cure the depression by loosening our buying power. For fifteen minutes we listened to an impassioned burst of eloquence and learned all the faults of all other makes, models, sizes, shapes, brands, grades and varieties of car. James enquired the price. The salesman rose to heights of eloquence which made Cicero look like a one-eared radio announcer. James followed up with a query as to when he could see the new models. At last James gave me the high sign and we sauntered toward the door. The salesman stopped for a breath and James said, quite nonchalantly, "Say you haven't got a spare calendar have you?"

The salesman stopped. "I'm sorry," he said, "but the stenographer just gave the last one away while I was talking to you gentlemen. Now about this twelve cylinder maroon colored sports model . . . . . "

We oozed out into the gangway.

"Shucks", said James.

I snickered up my pant leg.

Next we invaded a real estate office on . . . street. It was a prosperous looking joint and the owner, conducting a conversation over the telephone, waved us to a seat, pushed a box of cigars toward us and continued his conversation. I took three cigars and James scooped up two. James, who is something of a geologist, compared the hole made in the layer of cigars to the hole made in the earth when Mount Pelee blew up in the days when Hector was a pup. After three minutes wait the big executive told his client that he would call up later and clinch the deal. He turned to us, determined to sell us anything we wanted.

"And now gentlemen," said he, "what can I do for you," and he tried not to notice the hole in his box of cigars.

Now was the time to speak. "Have you any calendars?" I enquired wearily.

"No," he said between clenched teeth. I looked for James. He had gently floated out. I trickled after him.

By this time I began to think that our difficulty was due to the fact that we were a little late for the 1933 crop and a little early for the 1934 supply, until in the course of our perambulations I ducked into Wally Cusick's to miss a fellow who wants to get back three dollars I borrowed in the pre-boom years, B.C.—before the crash. To while away the time I asked for a calendar. Then seeing that calendars were being handed out, I made a plea for two, one for a "friend outside." Obediently the clerk wrapped up two and I went out. Meanwhile, James, unaware as to what had been going on entered and asked for another calendar.

"Cripes, I thought you were the friend, "retorted the flabbergasted and bamboozled clerk.

Somehow or other we have five of Wally's calendars. We got two at the Sup. by the way. Anybody who wants a calendar which looks like an advertisement for a bootlegger's practice, but is really decorated with a bottle of cod liver oil can have same by calling at the office between the hours of 2 and 3 a.m., of the morning of February 29th D.V.

The office will need papering next year and if the A.M.S. still holds out James and I will provide enough calendars to cover one corner at least. Prosperity may be back by then and calendars will be more plentiful than greenbacks, possibly.

THE CAMPUSCOPE

Super-Irradiation

A new weapon for use in the war against malignant neoplasm is being forged in Germany.

With the laboratory equipment used by Drs. Fritz Lange and Arno Brasch to split the atom last year, research workers of the Berlin Radium Institute have attempted treatment of comcerons growths by the application of X-rays produced by 2,500,000 volt electrical discharges. The subject of the experiment was a volunteer suffering from what had been judged a hopeless case of cancer. The experimenters believe that the treatment has saved his life.

The patient sat in a steel walled cubicle and was observed through a thick plate glass window. Each discharge occupied one ten-thousandth of a second and the tube voltage was estimated at 2,500,000 volts, providing cathode rays equivalent to the emanation from over 100 tons of radium.

The treatment consisted of five exposures with the affected part in different positions, so that all parts of the growth were fully exposed to the radiation from the huge cathode tube.

Dr. Boek, one of Berlin's most famous cancer specialists, who conducted the experiment with Professor Halberstaedter, is quoted as saying that he entertained high hopes of repeating on human patients the striking success which he had attained by this method on experimental animals. He admitted that the method was still, of course, in an early experimental stage.

Since the patient volunteer ran the risk of instant death in the course of the treatment, as the experimenters believed before trying it, the preparation for the treatment and its execution were carried out in secret, but now that the first essay in the treatment of humans has resulted in apparent success, the method has been published and its trial on other cases is practically certain.

Twenty-four hours after the first experient, the treated patient showed no ill effects and was ready to undergo the process a second time.

God Save Our Nation's Youth

Demanding the ousting of "the unhesirables" at the University of North Carolina, 100 residents of that state have petitioned the Governor to "save our state from further predatory acts by these so-called modern educators against things of the spirit."

"To prevent further poisoning by the enemy of those now attending or who may hereafter attend" the university is the aim of the group, which declares that the student publications are "straws which show whither the wind is blowing—toward Moscow, and whence it is coming — the class rooms."—Columbia Spectator.

Have You Pink Tooth Brush?

Dr. Pressey of the Ohio State University psychology department tells us that all students who flunk out of college are neither dumb nor lazy, but might only have needed a tooth pulled. This should cure the "depression" for the dentists—The Virginia Tech.

Artificial Heart

Moscow. Dr. Bruchinenko's 'artificial heart' goes on from strength to strength, and now holds out an immediate hope of the possibility of performing major cardiac operations on human beings.

'Already more than a dozen dogs have had 'their hearts dissected during the last two years, but all survive in normal health.

One operated on during four and a half minutes had its heart literally cut up and then sewn up in seventeen different places by Professor Terchinski with the help of Dr. Bruchinenko's artificial heart, which consists of a perfectly balanced circulation pump connected up with the vasrular system after the real heart has been disconnected.

The special chemical substance injected prevents the blood from coagulating during this marvellous preliminary operation, and afterwards while the heart is being linked up again. This substance keeps the blood in perfect condition for many hours. (Whig-Standard).

S. C. M. Shrapnel

With the coming of the Hart House Quartet on Friday evening the first meeting of the Conference had to be cancelled. This is regrettable since the first meeting promised to be unusually good. The rest of it promises to come up to a high level.

The first session is the supper Saturday evening. This will be an opportunity to thaw the coolness of non-acquaintance, and to meet Mr. McLennan. At 8.00 p.m. Prof. Eric Havelock will meet the Conference on the subject of "Christianity and Socialism. In case some one thinks that the supporters of Socialism are confined to the "have-nots" as against "the haves," or a group of irrational soap-box orators, it may be information to know that hardly a college in Canada but has able advocates on its staff.

There may be those who think that Socialistic and Christian Principles are antithetic. If there are objections to combining these terms some of us wish they would be raised. There are those who cannot see the conflict.

How interested are you in your professed religion? Allowing that the Christian religion is worth propagating, how much right has a missionary to start work among Mohammedans or Confucions? Regarding method, should churches be opened on a basis of competition with Buddhism or Confucianism? Mr. Faris, Queen's '24, will offer some discussion on this.

Religion does not popularly enter into International relations. It may be due to an inadequate concept of either or both terms.

Some Fun, eh, Kid?

A goldfish has been enrolled in the class of '36 at Syracuse University. Unable to tell its sex, the Dean of Women turned it over to the Dean of Men. Puzzled, he has decided to await until the spawning season, in the meantime allowing it to take examinations, as though it were regularly enrolled—Harvard Gazette.

Library Removal

Several hundred medical students are calling upon high heaven to witness their oppression, having not yet learned to cloak perturbation in sauvity as teachers and practitioners must.

The news is sifting around that the medical library was moved into the Old Arts Building during the late lamentable vacation. The cloister hush and solemnly thoughtful atmosphere of the Douglas Library are henceforth to be accessible only to those who strive after the possession of culture uncontaminated by science and those who seek science undiluted by culture. The next issue of the medical calendar will probably offer the information that, "The medical library was moved last year to a partially furnished semi-basement, in the hope that medical students might be stirred to greater efforts by the necessity of reading in a standing position than could be induced in the too comfortable and scholarly surroundings formerly provided in the Douglas Library."

At the date of present writing I am credibly informed that the library in its new location is open to students between the hours of nine and five only, that is, during the time when the terms of the curriculum demand that most of us be engaged elsewhere by lectures and what-not.

It is no more than reasonable to suppose that the funds provided for the erection and equipment of our beautiful library building were intended to benefit the university as a whole. The medical school is known to be the smallest of the faculties, but not the most egoistical philosopher or engineer could believe that it is the least important or the least deserving and desirous of adequate library facilities. Is it, then, just and seeming that the pursuit by medical students of adjuvant studies should be relegated to a corner that no brightness of spirit will serve to illuminate? Hardly.

T. R.

Here's An Alibi

A new alibi for lazy college students has been discovered recently by Dr. A. B. Jackson of the Harvard medical school.

According to Dr. Jackson, laziness may be caused by germs known as "normal body flora" that are ordinarily considered harmless. Victims of the disease suffer from a "slow poisoning." The symptoms are constant lassitude, sleepiness and indifference to studies. Magnesium salts have been found to be an effective treatment.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Sports Editor,
Queen's Journal,
Dear Sir:—

The following remarks were prompted by your article in a recent issue, "Hockey and Student Support."

You ask the question, "Why is the Queen's band conspicuous by its absence at both hockey and basketball games?"

As you may not know, the Queen's band is composed mainly of Kingston men who play in the band of the P.W.O.R. regiment. In the winter, during the hockey season, these men play for the Kingston-Frontenac Hockey Club as part of its rooting section.

When these veterans are removed, it is doubtful if there are enough students remaining to form a respectable musical organization.

There is no reason, however, why we can't have a cheer leader and a skit or two put on by the luckless frosh. Perchance there are some fancy skaters in our midst! At any rate, something should be done to liven up things between periods.

I agree with you that all the students who can, should turn out for the Queen's games, because, by the size of the crowds at the City League games, there will be a large Kingston contingent supporting their teams in the O.H.A.

We want to give our teams the same moral and vocal support, so let's go!

"Kingston Student."

Last summer a game warden of Oshkosh, Nebraska, noticed a fish net in Swan Lake. As it is against the law to use a seine net in the state, the warden hid nearby in an attempt to catch the law-breakers. After waiting all night he pounced upon a group of men who came to examine their catch. Among them was a professor in the zoology department of the college. He advanced the alibi that he was studying the habit and the menu of the fish. The warden, no doubt awed by the presence of a member of the fifth estate, promptly apologized for interrupting the progress of science. —The Lafayette.

A senior co-ed at the All-University Prom at Boston became highly indignant when a puny freshman cut in while she was dancing with one of the greatest athletes of the school. She addressed the freshman in such a way that he hung his head in shame and replied: "I'm sorry lady, but you see I'm working my way through college, and your partner was waving a five dollar bill at me!"—Franklin and Marshall Wrekly.

PROSPERITY
Marie Dressler and Polly Moran.

Marie Dressler and Polly Moran are brought before you in another gale of laughter—Prosperity. Marie as Maggie Warren, a bank president upholds the family name in the face of a run and a wholesale bond robbery in which her son John is implicated. John with the usual happy family, a wife and two children meets with interference from his mother-in-law. , Polly Moran as the mother-in-law goes through finding fault as usual. Her performance isn't up to the usual standard which is probably accounted for by her remodelled nose. Despite this fact she succeeds in drawing howls from the audience at the wedding when her face is artistically, but unexpectedly draped in cake and when she draws her money from the bank. She recovers some of her old style when John comes through with the bonds and saves his mother from shooting herself. Polly as Mrs. Praskins disturbes Maggie in the usual shooting scene, and the comedy reaches the high note when Maggie discovers that she thought she had swallowed a bottle of poison and finds out that it was only a laxative.

Marie Dressler makes the best of an overworked plot and produces a comedy worth seeing. She succeeds in getting her audience to sneak out the handkerchief once in a while, but they become almost immediately ashamed of themselves in the humorous result of what started to be a wet scene. The picture drags at times with a lot of unnecessary and mushy sentiment. Norman Foster as John Warreu plays in a mediocre fashion which Anita Page as his wife does not supplement with any extraordinary acting. B+.

THE DEVIL IS DRIVING
with
Edmund Lowe, Wynne Gibson, James Gleason, Lois Wilson

Seeing "The Devil Is Driving" is very much like reading an adventure story on a train. Enter the obvious implication of doing either for want of anything better to do.

James Gleason assumes the rôle of a garage owner who uses his garage to protect the interests of a racketeer issuing orders from a penthouse above. Later, the garage owner, incensed at the crippling of his child by an escaping car driven by one of the gang, demands justice of the racketeer. It becomes necessary to the well being of the gang that Mr. Gleason be "cooled off", in the patois of the underworld. His brother-in-law, Edmund Lowe, eventually apprehends the murderer. Before all this is settled, however, there are numerous shots of much va et vient in the penthouse. People come in and out, the more persistent ones being rapped on the head by a repulsive deaf-mute, who represents the macabre element.

Edmund Lowe plays an embittered male who falls in love with a girl apparently part of the retinue surrounding the racketeer. Wynne Gibson is cast in her usual rôle. Lowe outwisecracks her all along, turns her into a Can You Take It Girl, and finally marries her. C+.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Kingston, Ont.,
Jan. 7th, 1933.

Dear Sir:

Since it seems the thing to do now, I am writing this denunciation of lack of interest on the part of the student body in general and the student executives in particular. It is quite evident in the lack of attendance at the various society meetings, where business is carried on by a small group similar to the well-known Family Compact. Perhaps if the other students could break down this system, things might be the same as they were way back in 1930-31.

Levana is not included in this, since they have achieved the honour of winning the only trophies at Queen's so far this year. Witness the tennis and debating. The whole blame falls on the male element and if this college had fewer "perfect ladies" among the masculine section and more real he-men, student affairs and sports would be adequately supported. In less than a week our hockey team starts its battle for championship and all that supporters would do wonders to improve their chances. Come on, Gentlemen, forget your frats and bridge games and turn out in a united body to help recover at least one trophy. There is just as much fun at a hockey match and basketball games as at the rugby games.

Perhaps Levana is expected to develop the initiative here, or is it another policy of "passive resistance"?

Book Chats

By R.M.

Although the "Vicar of Wakefield" is one of the most popular of the English classics to-day, it was not hailed as a great novel when it first appeared in 1766. Perhaps the reason for this attitude may be found in the temper and spirit of the age, which preferred artificiality, wit and luxury to the natural, typically human and simple aspects of society. Be that as it may, later critics, like Goethe and Dickens, were anything but chary in their praise To Goethe "The Vicar of Wakefield" embodied all that was best in the life of rural England in the eighteenth century. Charles Dickens made it a constant bedside companion.

Wherein do its excellencies lie? Oliver Goldsmith makes some capital uses of setting but it is not his forte. The description of the grounds around Dr. Primrise's small cure is infused with a kindly humour and presented with a picturesqueness that defies imitation: "Our little habitation was situated at the foot of a sloping hill, sheltered with a beautiful underwood behind, and a prattling river before; on the one side a meadow, on the other a green. Nothing could excell the neatness of my little enclosures, the elms and hedgerows appearing with inexpressible beauty." As for the elements of time and place, they are not very conspicious in this novel. We are not told in what period the story occurs or how much time elapses between the beginning and the end. A specific locality is not named either, although we know most of the tale happens near London. Local colour, as a component of place, is presented pervasively; and generally, there is a real harmony in this story between the setting and the characters: they tend to adopt themselves to their environment without conscious struggle, — surroundings do not dominate them, nor do they effect complete escape from their environment. The milieu in which the characters live, move, and have their being shifts several times, most notably from the vicarage to a debtors' prison.

Characterization in this novel is well handled and one recognizes a number of distinct types. Neither the analytic nor dramatic methods are used. The Vicar is, of course, the principal actor and the story is told from his point of view. His quiet humour and description, his maxims of temperance, simplicity and contentment are those of Goldsmith himself. A good deal of the Vicar's personality, however, is revealed indirectly, through other characters. Thus Sir William Thornhill is akin to him in his aversion for luxury, town life and adulation.

Squire Thornhill, Sir William's nephew, is the type of rake common in the pit of Drury Lane. Ephraim Jenkinson, who fleeced Moses and his father, is the kind of sharper always present at country fairs; he is quite in character when he reforms at the end of the book. With the exception of Lady Blarney and Carolina Wilhelmina Amelia Skeggs ("wild women" from London) the females are without distinctive traits. It is true that Sophia and Olivia try their wings but become the victims of seductions and abductions. Goldsmith's powers of characterization are most aptly shown in the dialogue between the two London ladies. Burchill's repeated "indge" at the end of each affected speech has the effect of pointing the humour of the scene.

In spite of frequent digressions and habitual moralizing, the Vicar of Wakefield has a lasting appeal, one that has brought the great hearts of all nations to reveve it as the best novel in English Literature. There may be difference of opinion as to its supremacy, yet the portrayal of rural English life, its simplicity, its honest hard-working people, cannot fail to touch the hearts of future generations, no matter how cynical are their attitudes or how sophisticated are their codes of ethics.

There must be no enforced respect for elders.

Children should not be discouraged from swearing.

Children should be entirely free from sex taboos.

Modern Girl Arouses Wrath Of Uncle Ben

"The twentieth century girl is unreliable, narrow-minded, bigoted, self-centred, hypocritical, etc., etcs.," declared Uncle Ben in an exclusive interview to the Journal today. "The twentieth century girl represents the theory of evolution gone flooey. The female of the species has become a mere spineless gold-digger, a ruthless extractor of ingots and shekels, a silken clad tiger . . . wait till I wipe my chin, fella. Yes. Them is my sentiments and I stick to them," continued the reverend gentleman in a notable blaze of indignation as he watched a couple of lanky co-eds saunter past the Union. "Yes, I repeat it. The girl of today is not the same virile creature her great-grandmother or even her grandmother was. I know. I know. I have had lots of experience."

The author of 'How, When, Why and Where to Park the Car', 'Necking in Nebraska' and 'My Experiences in the North Country', smoothed his white beard down and tucked it inside his belt before continuing. Then, slowly running a toothpick over his toothless gums he went on, "I mind when I was a boy many years ago. That was just when the new Model T Fords were coming in. Now there was a car for you. Just as sweet as they make them. Well, as I was going to say when you so rudely interrupted me the modern girl ain't like her grandmother. Take clothes for instance. Now in my day business was good because women wore lots of clothes. That is why there were no depressions in them days. The modern girl doesn't wear enough to flag a train or clean a shotgun. In my time the average woman had enough clothes to outfit the Wolfe Islander with a complete set of sails. You didn't need to wear smoked glasses on a windy day when I was a student."

"And why in heck do the modern girls wear so much warpaint? In my time when you looked at a sweet young thing you could be sure that she was no walking tribute to the old slogan, 'Paint Preserves'," continued the patriarch. "Now these modern girls go round painted like an ocean grey-hound. When they kiss you the tell-tale marks stick to your hide like brands on government beef." At this moment Uncle Ben nervously began to brush some pinkish looking stains from his flowing beard.

"I was disillusioned in love," said Uncle Ben reflectively moving his right ear. "Yes sir, I was hooked but I got off in time. So I never married and when I die my honoured name will be distinguished or extinguished because I am an only child. But I do regret to say that the modern girl is not the girl her grandmother was. If I wanted to talk now . . ."

Uncle Ben here gazed intenly out of the window. A slim, young thing had just come out of the library and was walking toward Union Street. Uncle Ben sat up, dusted his beard, retied his bow tie and rose nonchalantly.

"Here comes my niece, now," he said. "Call round and see me some other time young fella. I like to hear you talk," and he vanished downstairs.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Queen's University,
Kingston, Ont.

The Editor,
Queen's Journal.

Dear Sir,

Kindly allow me, Sir, this opportunity of airing a new grievance through the columns of your valuable paper, and thus add another to the already long list.

This is the story of Henry.

Henry, at the age of ten, was a bright little lad. He came of good stock. His father was a butcher and his mother used to be an opera singer.

On Christmas of the year he entered Hickville High School he was given a violin, and in the New Year he started to take lessons on it. Five years later we find Henry about to graduate from High School He is now a member of his High School orchestra, and also another down-town ontfit. He has quit taking lessons, but has several music exams to his credit. All-in-all, he could be considered a fairly good violinist.

That fall he comes down to Queen's, and, to his disappointment, there is no orchestra here. His landlady doesn't like music. True, there is a music group. But Henry doesn't want to hear the Philharmonic orchestra render Mozart's Symphony in X Minor, from a Victrola record. He wants to play himself. He finds his practice slackening. Finally he goes home at Christmas and leaves his violin there to stay. He returns to Queen's and soon forgets most of what he ever knew about playing the violin. That is the story of Henry.

But why wasn't Henry given a chance to further develop his talent at Queen's? Why is there no orchestra at Queen's, like the one at Hickville High School?

There are plenty of students here in just the same position as Henry. They should be given some outlet for their talent, after spending so much time in learning to play.

Yours truly,
"Henry."

Sports Views

With the advent of league hockey, the doldrum period in the sporting life of the college is ended. Following the final rugby game, there ensues a dull season, when the plugging of notes is the chief indoor sport and not much sport at that.

Even the age-old indoor sports, best exemplified, so I am told, on the chesterfields of Ban Righ's historical common room, are discontinued during the examination period, and that's how good exams. are.

However the boys and girls are back at it again, and one of these days I'll have an article on indoor sports if I can stop one of the boys panting long enough to write it.

A glance at the list of men trying out for the Senior Hockey team shows that Science and Meds. each have 6 students seeking places, while Arts have 9. Or if you like to split the latter up, Commerce have 3, and Arts have 6.

Science men apparently are more interested in the bumping positions and have no liking for goal tending or a front line job. They only have one man trying out for a forward position and none with goaltending ambitions. But five of the Engineers will be found on the defence where they can bump and be bumped and like it.

Meds. donated a goalie, a defence man and four forwards, while Arts [illegible] goalies, two defence and [illegible] forwards.

[illegible] may yet be found in an Intercollegiate group, but there is [illegible] to report as yet. As one knows the logical place for [illegible] competition with McGill and possibly Ottawa U. But there are many [illegible] in the way of such a group and the powers that be at Queen's have done all in their power to make satisfactory arrangements for an intercollegiate series. There's no doubt however that Intercollegiate hockey would provide far more colour and interest to the students than do the present teams. But students must turn out and support their team no matter who their opponents may be.

[illegible] success of Canadian Intercollegiate hockey teams against hockey teams representing U.S.A. universities this year has revived the question of an International Intercollegiate League. The question has recently been tackled with varying degrees of success. Representatives were sent abroad to American universities with a view of arranging a suitable schedule, but as yet nothing has come of it.

[illegible] for a complete schedule [illegible] any one winter is out of the question on account of time and [illegible] involved, but the latest suggestion of a series patterned after the Ontario Hockey League is receiving favor. There would be American and Canadian Intercollegiate leagues, but with a few international games staged each year to add interest. However the question is a big one and much planning will have to be done before the league is a reality.

With roughly sixteen hundred student tickets paid for, why cannot we fill the rink and help the Tricolor teams?

And we ought to drown out the Kingston Bull Pen too. A few husky cheers will make the rafters shimmy and pep up the team.

Senior "B's" Tackle Kingston On Friday

What a day to choose to open the local Senior "B" season? Friday the 13th, according to the superstitious is just about the worst possible date for everything and everybody. However the jinx date sees Queen's Seniors tackling Kingston's Imps and the Cadet classy contingent invading Gananoque, with a view to taking a decision out of that town. And as all four teams cannot take a slice of bad luck, somebody's going to win.

Jinx or no jinx, we are looking for a Tricolor win and a glance over the list of aspirants for places on the Queen's team will reveal plenty of power and speed. It sho' looks bad for Kingston.

The first half of the schedule shows that Queen's are away from home for three games, though of course only one of them is an out-of-town affair. Friday the 27th is the first game at which students' tickets are of value, but it is expected that good crowds will be on hand at other games in which Queen's is playing.

Billy Glass is managing the Senior team and he reports that a small army has turned out for practices the latter part of last week. Some are of senior calibre and others not so good, but all will get a real opportunity to show what they can do before the team is picked. However take a peek at the following and see if you like them.

Goalies? Sure we have three of them and all good. Danny Daniels, Bert Parsons and MacForsythe are prepared to stop the flying rubber with any part of their anatomy that they can get into position, and they can use the stick too.

In these days of freak rules whereby the defence men can body-check any eligible puck receiver, as well as the puck carrier, a husky defence is required, and Dick Storms, "Lulu" Kustuik, Jerry Byrne, "Taf" Byrne, Sheppard, Champaigne, Teague and Simpson fill all specifications. In addition to being husky they are all mighty fast men, and their rushes will be pretty to watch. Can they take it? Watch them do it.

Ten trusty frontliners have been showing their wares lately in practises and Coach Elmer doesn't find it easy to decide who to throw on the ice first. Most of them possess speed to burn and a little more polish around the nets will turn them into big goal scorers. Jimmy Davis, "Junior" Elliot, Bill Carr, "Paddy" Patterson, Jack Murphy, "Shorty" Morgan, "Sock" Smith, Jimmy Arthurs, G. E. Wallace and "Cappy" Capstik are in the hunt for positions and how they hunt.

Next week practices will be held on Tuesday at 6.30, and Wednesday at 4.30, and following these the team will be picked for Friday's game. The probable starting line will be in Friday's issue.

Junior Hockey Team Training Intensively

Both Queen's hockey squads are now in the midst of an intensive grind, aiming to get into perfect playing condition and also endeavoring to make their plays click nicely.

The juniors are first to go to the starting post and as it is a home game, a capacity house is expected to see the struggle with Kingston Juniors. Kingston fans always strong supporters of Junior puck chasing in the Limestone City, are sure to turn out in great droves to see their clever team take on the University aggregation. Queen's also will throw over the boards a team of battlers of pronounced ability and the students should jam the rink to spur on their favorites.

It is no secret that those in close touch with hockey affairs consider the Tricolor entry a decided threat and with Coach Wally Elmer also highly pleased with their practices to date, the fans can be sure of action from start to finish.

Manager Jack Baker, Gananoque's foremost orator has reported that the following players will form the junior squad and that the team will be picked from amongst their numbers.

The team possesses very capable goalies in McNab and James, and whichever man is sent in to guard the strings, will see that only shots from very close in will be scorers.

Wing, Gibson, Pettit, Smith and Devlin form an imposing array of fast husky defense men, and if they show up as well in games as they have done in practice, opposing forwards are going to be mighty wary when they hit the Queen' blue line.

Up along the front line Coach Elmer has to decide between Bain, Christie, Corrigan, Brydon, Lewis, McQuaig, Samuel and Hoffman, and if that isn't a dose of arsenic for the Limestone defense then we don't know what is. They are all fast, and tricky and they have absorbed the Coach's lessons in huge quantities. Others will be very welcome and if they have not turned out as yet they are urged to do so without further delay. Practices are held daily between 12 and 1 p.m.

Very little dope is available regarding Kingston Juniors, but if they present a team that has half the ability of last year's youngsters, then Queen's will have to step to down them.

This should be Queen's best year in Hockey and the success of the teams depends upon the support accorded them by the students. Let's make this opening game tomorrow evening an event in hockey circles. How about sending our Juniors on their way with a big crowd, and plenty of pep and cheers. We would like to see Levana filling an entire section, and how their presence would spur the boys on.

Bander Snatches

Alice was unpacking her trunk after the holidays when the Red Queen dropped in for a chat.

"It's nice to be back," Alice remarked by way of striking up a conversation. "Of course holidays are nice too, but dad is so inquisitive about some things and I simply had a terrible time trying to answer all his questions. He asked the hardest things—"

"Such as what?" interrupted the Red Queen, who always liked to get right to the core of things.

"Such as Student Government for one thing," Alice answered. "You see, he has a copy of the Calendar and mother says he reads it every so often, just to reassure himself what a good college his daughter attends. He knows all about public affairs and elections and talks about the science of government, and when he read that Queen's was the first university to adopt student government he could hardly wait till I got home to ask me about it. He has the quaintest ideas. You see, he thinks that with all the professors of history and economics and political science student government ought to be a wonderful thing at Queen's.

"I always thought it was," Alice went on, "till dad got talking about it. But now I don't know at all. I couldn't tell him half the things he asked, so I got out the Constitutions of the Levana Society and the A.M.S. and gave them to him to read. He started on the A.M.S. first. "Huh, taxation without representation," he remarked "Freshmen pay fees but can't vote." He began turning the pages slowly but I slipped off to bed. I thought that would be the last of it, but the next morning dad had everything all figured out. He started in something like this, "The annual meeting of the A.M.S. is held in March and another meeting is held in November for nominations, and if any changes are made in the constitution a meeting is held to ratify them. Otherwise there seem to be no other meetings at all except executive ones. "Student Government" he snorted, "Bah! One of the leading Universities in a British country with a government modelled after that of the United States! Four months out of the student year between elections and the only general meeting provided for in the constitution. No provision for a want of confidence motion, no official opposition, no way a student can voice his ideas, not even by petitioning the executive! Self government—Bah!" Then he started in on the Levana Society. "Now this looks more like it. The women seem to know what they are doing. They can make, second or support any motion or amendment. They have meetings once a month and must have a special meeting any time ten members request it. The members can amend the constitution. Looks like the women have it all over the A.M.S."

"Of course they have. Your dad was right," said the Red Queen. "I think so, too. But till dad got talking about it I thought the men must have worked out a better plan."

"Better for them perhaps," said the Red Queen, "but let me tell you, the poor dears are like the Phillipines, they're not fit for self-government. It's the girls that need experience in governing, and they get it in the Levana Society. Men rarely know anything about self-government. Their affairs are always run by an executive."

"I see," said Alice. "You mean that men should get used to being run by ——somebody."

"Don't let us discuss it," said the Red Queen. "Some day you will understand. After you grow up."

"But," said Alice. "Do all men really need an executive to run their affairs?"

"All of them," said the Red Queen. "Students and professors, prize-fighters and novelists, sinners and saints, tall men, fat men, statesman and politicians. None of them are fit for self-government. All of them need to be managed."

"And yet," Alice mused, "Mr. Bennett and Mr. King are both bachelors."

"There you go again," said the Red Queen. "What have they got to do with it?"

"I was just thinking—," said Alice.

"Thinking!" the Red Queen interrupted contemptuously." You should never attempt it; especially when you have so very little to think with. But, let me ask you this question—have Mr. Bennett and Mr. King made a success of government or have they made a mess of it?"

"I'm sure I don't know, Alice replied, "We have not come to that yet. But I'll ask my History Professor. He knows all about everything like that—Legislative assemblies, governors, Executive councils and——"

"Wandering again," her Majesty grunted. "I don't know how we are ever going to make anything out of you. And anyway, I'm tired, and what's infinitely more important, I'm going to bed."

So Alice finished her unpacking alone, and after she got into bed she began thinking about her mother and dad, about the Red Queen and about all the people he knew, and as she dozed off, she was saying to herself, "Poor dad, he may think he knows all about things—but mother and the Red Queen know more—and Levana is all right—and so is the Alma Mater Society—and Queen's is all right—and beds are comfortable places—and President Hoover was quite right if he refused to give self-government to the Phillipine Islands—but I'm sort of sorry for dad—He's so interested in government—but then mother is awfully good to him—and after all, he's perfectly happy.

TREACLE AND INK.

Basketeers Resume Practice To-Morrow

The three basketball teams resumed practice on Wednesday, the new arrangement on the gym. floor giving greater opportunity to practice, the Senior and Intermediate squads working out on the west court and two junior squads on the last court. Practices were held on Wednesday, Friday and Saturday and effort is being made to arrange two exhibition games for the senior squad before the Intercollegiate season opens here on Jan. 29th against Varsity. The following players have filled in eligibility certificates for the senior squad—Bews, McLaughlin, Hallet and Carter of last year's squad; Newman, Rooke, Brown and Eby of last year's Intermediate squad, and three freshmen, McMahon, Booth and Tilley. Only eight men will be carried in the Intercollegiate squad, and the rest will play intermediate. There promises to be keen competition for the eight places on the squad.

The intermediates should field the strongest team in years. Along with the several squad who cannot be carried in Intercollegiate, they have Junior Elliott, Bruce, Bruce, Megill and Chuck Findlay.

The junior squad of large proportions promises to show many players of exceptional ability, mostly freshmen.

And it came to pass that in the first month of the fourth year of the reign of Pinph King of the Children of Kweanz that Oille the Anointed High Priest of the Tribe of Scienz '35 gathered together the scribes and the elders of the people, saying, I have seen a vision. And the people were afraid saying, what can this thing mean? And they began to murmur among themselves. Then said Oille unto them, Behold on that night I saw the Lord, even the Lord Fockstrotux high and lifted up; and about him were six saxophs; and with twain he covered his head and with twain he covered his breast and with twain he did play. "And there came a voice saying, Dance, and I said, how shall I dance? The spirit is willing, but the pocket is weak. Then spoke the voice to me a second time. Fear not. But gather the people together unto the Hostel of Salle, in the place that is called Kin, and there shall ye do reverence to me with tabour and pipe, with music and dancing. Selah.

Then said the people one to another, let us do so even as has been commanded lest evil befall us. And they straightway began to make ready according to the interpretation of the vision of Oille the Anointed which he had declared unto them.

And Russ, Son of Thoman, and others, elders of the tribe, were sent to spy out the land. And coming to the Hostel of Salle by day they boldly entered in and chose out a chamber in which to do reverence as they had been bidden. And the height of it was ten cubits, and the width of it was thirty cubits, and the length of it was fifty cubits. And as for the story of the rest of the work of Russ son of Thoman is it not written in the Book of the Chronicles of Kweanz?

Now when the people were all come together in the tabernacle of the Hostel of Salle to do reverence to Fockstrotux, it came to pass that Hop, son of Kirk, and his sons, and his sons' sons, was called by Russ, son of Thoman, to make ready music for the tribe. Then Hop and his sons and his sons' sons put on the robes of their calling, and began to till the tabernacle with music. And the young men took unto themselves virgins of the tribe of Lev. and did even as they had been commanded. And they began to be very merry.

And it chanced that that at that time there sojourned in the land of Kin, Eeboh, a damsel from a neighbouring country, and she was present with others of the tribe of Lev. to offer up worship to the god Fockstrotux. And being called upon to do reverence, she began to sing a psalm saying, "I will lift up my voice unto the saxoph whence cometh my inspiration." And the elders and the people were much pleased thereat. And it also happened that Bill, son of Gum-aa, being moved by the spirit, did play upon the lyre to the great delight of the people of the tribes of Scienz '35 and Lev., and of those of other tribes which also had come to worship there. For a great multitude had gathered together in that place, both from the north and the south, and from the East and the West. And they continued with music and dancing far into the night, until about the second hour.

Then did Oille the High Priest, and Russ, son of Thoman, make an end. And the evening and the morning were a full day. Then did the people betake themselves each one to his own dwelling (?), and Hop, son of Kirk and his sons and his sons' sons who had wrought mightily and by their playing much pleased the people, put off their robes of office and betook themselves each man to his bed.

Thus was fulfilled the prophecy of the prophet Chopeh, that in the year of the least prosperity in the land of Kin, the elders and the people of the children of Kweanz should go aside out of the way of their father to worship after the gods of the heathens. (Whisper it not in Kin lest the daughters of the undescribed rejoice).

Arts Formal Committee Plans Maturing Rapidly

ties, etc., arranged but no music. And you should see a dance without music! Try it sometime.

But the hero in the form of the convener rushed down to Toronto, did a little campaigning for Mayor Stewart, lunched with the Board of Control and incidentally hired an orchestra. It is rumoured that he was given free sample tickets to all the dance halls in the district in order that he could decide the "best by test," and his taste is perfect, as you will readily agree when you learn of his choice. Watch the next issue of the Journal for this vitally important announcement!

Whenever you see a committee man, give him a kindly word. The poor soul will appreciate your sympathy. Aside from the torment when pacing the floor wondering whether it will be a baby boy or girl, no worries can surpass those of a formal committee.

The best way to show admiration of their effort is to buy a ticket. Cheques made payable to the Arts Formal Committee (or $5 in currency) will be accepted by Ken Heath and Art Hall in the Arts Clubroom on Wednesday and Friday between 3.30 and 5.30 in the afternoon. Get your tickets early.

The members of the committee besides the above are Bob Johnston, Walt Horn, Stu Major, "Chuck" O'Neill, Roy Sharp, Max Rapoport and Mel Halpenny (convener).

BOOTLEGGING IN AUSTRIA

Because the price of pork is much higher in Austria than in Hungary the Austrian government is having a hard time trying to keep pigs from being smuggled in. The newest trick recently discovered is for women to disguise suckling pigs as babies and to carry them across the border at night. The pigs are dressed in babies clothing and, by giving them a drink of alcohol they are stupefied to guard against any squealing while the "mother" carries her "sleeping child" across the border.—Purdue Exponent.

Student Exchange Obtains Approval

At the meeting of the officers of the National Federation of Canadian University Students held in Montreal, Percy G. Davies, M.P., Secretary of the Federation, presented a report on the Exchange of Undergraduates Plan. Mr. Davies reported in particular on the discussion of the Exchange Scholarships which took place at the last session of the National Conference of Canadian Universities. This Conference is composed of the presidents and registrars of the Canadian universities, and the N.F.C.U.S. Secretary was invited to be present when the Exchange Plan was discussed.

Several university heads expressed their opinions regarding the scheme and were, without exception, pleased with the way in which it has worked.

President R. C. Wallace of the University of Alberta thought the plan had worked well. "The important thing seems to me to be," said Dr. Wallace "that students of ability be sent out as ambassadors, who will not be so bound down to their studies, because they find their studies difficult to keep up with, as to be unable to mingle in the student life. They ought to be able to bring to their university both sides of the university they have visited . . . I think we all agree that the scheme is a statesmanlike one and we ought to remember the credit of our Canadian undergraduates that they initiated it by themselves."

President Murray of the University of Saskatchewan, in whose opinions Principal Wallace of University College (Toronto) concurred, thought that there were two excellent reasons for supporting the scheme. The first reason is educational. "There is a great tendency for our students to become too restricted in their outlook," Dr. Murray said. The other reason is a national one. "I foresee great danger of estrangement between the East and West in the years to come, and every movement that brings the people of the East and West together is of great national value."

An Exchange Scholarship permits the holder to study for one year at a Canadian university other than his "home" university without paying tuition fees. Full details may be obtained from the local N. F. C.U.S. representative, the president of the Students' Council.

Campus and Gym

Although the Levana Intercollegiate Hockey team has not been officially named, the girls are getting into shape with a series of games with the various year teams in the University. The first of these was played on Monday and the second will be played on Wednesday, January 11, when the Levana team will play a team from Meds '38 at 1 o'clock in Jock Harty Arena. It is not generally known that the Levana team practice each day from 1 to 2 o'clock in the Arena but it should not be difficult for rooters to turn out and support the team in this series of games.

Working hard to defeat the Science '33 team, the Levana hockey team lost a hard-fought game by the score of 5-2. Science '33 had collected a stellar team which out-played the girls and kept the Levana goalie busy warding off shots. Margaret McGregor in goal, and Marg. Chambers and Jean Cameron on the defence starred for Levana. The line-ups were:

Levana — Margaret McGregor, Jean Wilson, Dot Clemens, Jean Cameron, Jean Stewart, Marg. Chambers, Ruby Cordy, Carmel Milne.

Science '33—McDiarmid, Hoskings, Gray, Capstick, Bracken, Hallett, Stewart, Wilson, Young, McMillan.

Referee—Ray Dougal.

Paddle Your Own Canoe, Lady!

Stanford authorities have ended the romance of canoeing on their campus. Under a rule recently put into effect no young maiden is allowed to be rescued by the hero who has accidentally overturned the boat. Hereafter, all co-eds must pass a test in swimming and life saving before they are allowed in a canoe.

Helpful Hints For Unseasoned Studes

1933 started off with a bang, several bangs in fact, as students eagerly sought to find out their examination results and to know if they had been successful in Siberian 63, or Technology 22. To those who failed to make the grade the following advice may be useful.

Consider examinations as a personal encounter between Prof. I. Toldyonso and yourself. Remember that the professor is always, if not usually right and in any case he marks the papers. Study the opponent in question. If you are a good-looking co-ed you may start with an advantage but this may be a disadvantage if your examiner is a woman-hater, a cynic, or a disillusioned man. Find out if the professor has any fads. If he collects Runic inscriptions, or La Salle sugar-bowls, discourse amiably about these things on your paper when you are a little vague about certain things. Don't reason against the examiner. Don't ever argue against your professor at any of the innumerable discussion groups, and answer his class questions in such a way as to make his line of mental perambulation seem incontrovertable.

Other little aids which might be suggested here. Write your name on all the cards of all the books on the reserve shelf in your courses. Taking the professor's daughter out once in a while is an old standby but one runs the risk of getting into a conversation with her papa and exposing one's abysmal ignorance about Runic inscriptions or Samoan soup kitchens.

Again it is pretty safe to write letters to the Journal about things you think the professor disagrees with but the effect is sometimes lost if you forget to sign your name. Another mark-getter is the ability to sleep with your eyes open and a look of interest on your face. However, if you snore don't try this because no human being likes to be interrupted by a bass bellow.

Talking to the professor after class and getting him to explain passages you have unearthed in dusty volumes may be all right but it is nowhere mentioned in Mrs. Bamboozles' Book on Mark-Getting. One principle we believe that the professor should be given a rest the end of his lecture and it is probable that this will be made compulsory by an act being introduced into the Dominion Parliament by the Professor's Union.

When all is said and done, and you have indicated that you are well informed enough to seem to deserve a 'degree,' you will realize the benefits of a university education consist of more than a list of academic subjects overcome. You will go out into the world with a knowledge of persuasive psychology that will stand you in good stead when you are selling magazines from door to door or trying to get another piece of bread at the municipal soup kitchen.

"Knights Of Sweet Music" To Play For Merrymakers At Arts Formal

Montreal Orchestra Featured In Station CKAC Broadcasts

Arrangements have been completed with Ken Large and his Canadians of the Maples Hotel, Lakeside, Quebec, to provide the music for the Arts Annual At Home, Friday, January 27th. These "Knights of Sweet Music" are featured by radio station CKAC Montreal every afternoon at 5 o'clock. The convener insists on using superlatives in describing their performance and says "The list of entertainment numbers cannot be improved upon as throughout his program Ken Large features the soft harmony type of music. The vocalist, Sonny Green, is a 'knockout.' Just tune in on CKAC any afternoon and you'll agree that they're the snappiest, peppiest bunch of revellers you've heard." This orchestra frequently plays over the C.P.R. network. It has appeared at the College Inn and Calvin Gables in Buffalo and at the Prince of Wales Club in Niagara Falls. At present it is engaged at the Maples Hotel, situated on the picturesque lake-shore drive into Montreal.

The decorations will be in the form of a white background with silver, red and yellow colors blended into an Egyptian atmosphere that gives a pleasing sight. Archaeologists should feel at home among the giant urns which will decorate the gym. A modernistic touch however, predominat-

To Hold Dramatic Festival Eliminations

Prof. J. Roy Convener For Eastern Ontario

The Journal has learned that the preliminary trials in the Eastern Ontario division of the Ontario Dramatic Festival will be held in Kingston shortly. A large measure of credit must go to Lord Bessborough for the initiation of this Dominion-wide amateur dramatic competition.

Professor Roy is convener of the committee for Eastern Ontario and will receive entries up till Tuesday. At the time of going to press it is not known what the plans of the Faculty players are in this connection; quite likely, they will enter the preliminaries.

In an interview with the president of the Queen's Dramatic Guild we were told that the campus group will enter two plays, one probably being "Gammer Gurton's Needle."

Until after January 15th, no detailed figures concerning the number of entrants in Eastern Ontario will be forthcoming, but amateur organizations from Belleville, Brockville, Cornwall, Oshawa, and Ottawa, as well as from Kingston itself are expected to take part in the competitions in Convocation Hall.

"Russia" Next Topic Of Extension Lecture

The second in the 1933 series of lectures sponsored by the Extension Department of Queen's University will take place next Monday afternoon at 4.30 p.m.

The speaker for this occasion will be Mr. H. Spencer Clark from the Guild of All Arts. He has chosen as his subject, "Russia." The lecture will be illustrated. Everyone is asked to keep in mind that the lecture will start at 4.30 p.m., and not at 5 o'clock, as in the case of all other lectures in this series.

English Club Hears Prof. G. H. Clarke

Moody's Life And Writings Described

The life and works of the American poet, William Vaughan Moody, was the topic of an address delivered by Prof. G. H. Clarke, in his capacity of Hon. President of the English Club, at a meeting of that organization Wednesday afternoon.

Dr. Clarke prefaced his talk with some remarks on the English Club in past years, and gave some helpful suggestions for the future. He suggested a less formal atmosphere, a closer union with the Quill and informal discussions on literary and artistic topics.

Continuing, the speaker dealt with the life and works of William Vaughan Moody, describing his history of literature, his two plays, his lyrical odes, and other poems. Dr. Clarke also read two of his poems "Gloucester Moor" and another, to show the two sides of the poet's ability.

John H. Bell then gave reviews of three outstanding new books, "A Narrow Corner" by Somerset Maugham, "Faraway" by J. B. Priestly; "The Sheltered Life" by Ellen Glasgow. The stories were briefly outlined, and then the characters and action in each were discussed and criticized briefly. It is hoped to make this a regular feature of future meetings to keep the members in touch with the newest books published.

Owing to the illness of the president, John Grabb, the vice-president, Miss Violet Kilpatrick, was in the chair. The vice-president urged enthusiastic support and regular attendance from members to make the club a success and suggested that such person bring a friend to future meetings. The new reduced fee is set at 25 cents.

The conversazione ended with the serving of light refreshments under the capable supervision of Miss Katherine Kidd, social convener.

About forty were present at this first meeting which augurs well for a successful if belated season. The next meeting to be held soon will feature critical discussion of short stories and poems written by the members of the club.

Junior Hockey Team Defeat Kingston 6-5

Winning Goal Gained In Overtime Period

Queen's juniors helped themselves to a tidy win on Wednesday evening when they nosed out a strong Kingston team winning 6 to 5 in a struggle that lasted 90 minutes.

It was a nip and tuck sort of battle that kept a fairly large crowd glued to the pews until the thirty minutes overtime had been played.

Everything was in the game to make it a mighty interesting one to watch. Neither team had an edge and the goals were not easily earned. The teams played fast clean hockey and if the passing was a bit ragged at times, it was only because the boys were a little too anxious. Then, too, it was a first appearance and the rough spots will be well ironed out before the teams meet again.

The end of the regulation three periods found the teams deadlocked 3 goals apiece and it was anybody's battle up until then. the first overtime was scoreless, but the second produced bitter but clean playing and each scored a goal. The third period saw the Tricolor go one ahead and the lead was safely held.

Coach Elmer tossed a bunch of hard skating puck chasers over the boards. They can take it and give plenty back, and they pleased the crowd with their willingness to pass the puck and play combination hockey. If any stars should be chosen, Johnny Wing gets the honors. He was the fastest man on the ice, and was responsible for some clever work. His pass to McQuaig, who also glittered brightly, resulted in the winning goal when Mac. rounded the defence and fooled Sharpe Wing played real hockey and would be even more valuable if he would pass the puck at opportune times.

Kingston Juniors were every bit as good, and while the Tricolor stars appeared better at times, the Limestone fed puckers never gave up and led by Gordon, their red headed centre they pressed continually.

It was a mighty nice game to win and Coach Elmer was highly delighted with the work of the team. He saw plenty of plays

W. Jewitt Addresses Miller Club Meeting

Circumstances Favor African Prospecting

In a fascinating lecture W. Jewitt, a graduate of Queen's, told the Miller Club about "Prospecting in German South-West Africa" at a meeting held last Wednesday afternoon in Miller Hall.

Mr. Jewitt explained that the lack of vegetation caused by semi-arid conditions was a great help to prospectors in locating mineral outcrops although from a transportation standpoint the small rainfall was not so good, many of the rivers only flowing about one week in the year. The Country which became Mandated Territory in 1919, can be divided geologically into two parts. In the North East, copper, lead and zinc minerals are found in the Otawi dolomite of the Nama formation. Indeed at the Tsumib mine where a pipe of pegmatite instrudes into the dolomite, wonderful specimens of many rare minerals are found, one crystal of azurite being three feet long and absolutely perfect—a point which mineralogy students can appreciate.

At the Abenal Mine which is also in the Nama dolomite formation vanadium occurs as vanadite and desclosizite. On the other hand in the South West part of the Country tin occurs associated with intrusive granite. In connection with tin a point stressed by Mr. Jewitt was the difficulty in telling the tin ore "cassiterite" from tantalite and tourmaline in the field. Diamonds are found along the coast and are often searched for by moonlight when they can be seen sparkling. Gold, marble and gem beryl and tourmaline have also been mined. According to Mr. Jewitt the future of the Country depends on copper, tin and perhaps diamond mining.

During the course of his lecture Mr. Jewitt told some interesting personal experiences. The common belief has been that rhinoceros live in low swampy regions, but one day he encountered one on top of a 900 foot hill in an arid part of the country. He made everyone laugh when he told that he had investigated the various speeds that the wild animals are capable of. He had an old Buick which he drove over the flat level sands running the various animals down. Zebras it seems can travel 35 to 40 miles

Queen's C. O. T. C. Sharpshooters Place Fourth In Inter-University Rifle Contest

Queen's took fourth place in the inter-university rifle competition for 1932 with a mass score of 771 which is 7 points higher than the score with which they won the competition in 1931 when Desmond Burke was a member of of the team.

Remarkably good shooting was a feature of the competition, six individuals obtaining a score of 100 or better. University of New Brunswick came first with a grand total of 799. J. R. Cameron of their team obtaining the highest individual score with 104 out of 105 possible. University of Manitoba was next with 782, then University of British Columbia was third with 775 and Queen's were fourth with 771. University of Toronto with a score of 750 was fifth and R.M.C. came last with 682. Unfortunately McGill was unable to take part owing to adverse weather conditions.

The standing of the members of the Queen's team (C.O.T.C.) was as follows—R. H. Macklem 99; J. A. Huggins 98; J. A. McBurney 98; W. R. McLaren 98; W. A. Hayhurst 96; A. M. Leslie 96; C. L. Stroud 94; and R. N. Fairbridge 92.

Many Eminent Scholars To Attend S. C. M. Conference In Kingston

Graduates Of Many Notable Universities To Deliver Speeches

The S.C.M. Conference which will take place here over the week-end brings to Kingston several eminent scholars, among which will be Professor Eric Havelock, Rev. David A. McLennan, Rev. D. K. Faris. Professor Norman Rogers of the Queen's Department of Economics will also address a meeting of the Conference.

Eric Havelock, associate professor of classics in Victoria College, University of Toronto, is a brilliant and respected scholar in his field. He is a moving spirit in the League for Social Reconstruction.

He was born in London, England, and graduated with distinction from Cambridge University. His first academic post was in Acadia College, whence he was called to his present position in Toronto. Although he is one of the youngest faculty members in the University of Toronto, he is the centre of considerable attention both for his charm and brilliance as a lecturer and as a champion of the cause of the "disinherited." His home serves as a centre for student intellectual life; his weekly Sunday at homes are deeply appreciated by a growing group of serious-minded students. The conversation ranges from Aristotle to Bernard Shaw, and from the problem of non-being to the unemployment situation.

The extent of his influence may be guessed from the fact that he is one of the most popular leaders at the annual Elgin House Confer-

Musicale To Feature Dual Piano Numbers

The program for the Ban Righ Hall Musicale which is being held Sunday evening at 8.45 in the Common Room will include a two-piano number (8 hands) with Miss Phyliss Knight, Mrs. Tracy, Miss Lois Baker and Miss Phyliss Smith taking part. Professor and Mrs. Gummer will play a two-piano number of 4 hands and Mrs. Tracy will sing two numbers. A men's chorus will also present a number.

Arts Society Holds Successful Meeting

At Home Committee Head Presents Report

The burning enthusiasm which was expressed so emphatically at several Arts Society meetings before the holiday seems to have burned itself out. The showing of Freshmen at the first meeting of the Society this year was indeed small, and the Journal learns that it was a source of considerable disappointment to the Executive. Mr Stu. Warrington, President of the Society, in an interview with a Journal reporter after the meeting expressed regret that after the keen interest which had been displayed at the end of last term, so few people should have turned out to take advantage of the enjoyable entertainment provided by Arts '33 this semester. "I hope," he added "that at the next meeting, which will be in the hands of Arts '34, the attendance will be greatly improved."

After a short business meeting in Room 201 of the Arts Building the meeting adjourned to the Arts Club Room where the men of '33 were to supply the entertainment. In the business meeting Mel Halpenny, convener of the Arts Formal Committee, explained the difficulties connected with securing an orchestra of sufficient worth for the dance. Mr. Halpenny assured those present that the committee was working its hardest and that despite the difficulties encountered, the Formal this year would be better than ever. A vote of continued confidence in the committee was passed and the meeting adjourned to the Club Room.

Here, those in charge had arranged for a bridge game which lasted till six o'clock. Arts '33 were model hosts and, as well as providing cards (new ones) and prizes, they supplied cigarettes. In short, a pleasant time was had by all. Murray Turner and Garry Gherman carried off the prizes.

This first meeting of the Society for 1933 was a distinct success and if future meetings keep the same high standard set up by '33 they will be something to look forward to.

Arts '33 Year Dance Pleases Large Crowd

Guests Entertained By Novel Program

Arts '33 held a very successful year dance on Wednesday evening at the La Salle Hotel.

A large crowd turned out to this event, and registered keen approval of the program sponsored by the Dance Committee, which composed Miss Jo Tett, Miss Eileen McFarlane and Messrs. Doug. Muir, Art Sutherland, and Don McCaig.

Dean and Mrs. Matheson and Prof. and Mrs. Mackintosh were the patrons and patronesses.

In the course of the evening there was a clever tap dance by the "Tapping Twins," Misses Keele and Reynolds, and Bill Gummer at the piano played several popular numbers during the absence of Bob Warmington and his orchestra.

Wade Orser was responsible for the vocal numbers which formed a feature of the entertainment.

The printed programmes which purported to announce a broadcast from station FYA (First Year Arts) were an interesting novelty.

The Queen's Quill

The appearance of the second number of the Queen's Quill bears ample testimony to the presence in the University of a body of literary talent of no mean quality. It is much to be hoped therefore that this admirable publication will be well supported by the student body as a whole, for without an adequately large circulation the whole enterprise must fall to the ground.

The balance as well as the quality of the number is much to be commended. There is provided a range of reading material which, as one early notice in these columns claimed with justification, is adapted to "the most varied tastes and the most discriminating judgment." Moreover there is cause for congratulation not only in the quality of the contents but in the low price which makes it readily accessible to all. We hope that there will be few students indeed who will neglect to patronize this venture which is a credit not only to the staff of the Quill, but to the University to whose reputation it contributes an added distinction.

We extend our congratulations to the Editorial Staff of the Queen's Quill upon their latest success.

Luck And Examinations

Examinations afford an equitable system of grading students if we are to judge by the article on the subject published in the last issue of the Journal. Condensed from the "Journal of Engineering Education" this article brings new light on this topical subject.

There has always been much difference of opinion among educationalists regarding the value and fairness of final examinations. Written examinations as the sole factor in determining the fate or grade of a student have come to be looked upon with askance, and, while affording the most convenient solution under present conditions, their fairness as judges of a student's knowledge in a given course has come to be questioned generally.

Based on mathematical calculations entirely the article brought forth interesting and somewhat startling results, which would seem to prove that students have more than a 50% chance of passing their examinations. The following results, given in the article, show that written examinations are a boon rather than a handicap to students. In a 10 question examination written by 1000 students it was found that in the group who entered the examination knowing but half of their work (50%), one student would obtain at least 95%, 10 would be in the 85-95% class, 44 in the 75-84, 117 in the 70-74 and 828 below 70.

Thus it will be seen that of the 50% students, all of whom should have been on the border line or should have failed, 172 will pass, using 70% as the pass mark.

This is an intriguing demonstration, indeed, and should be most heartening to students generally, but too much faith must not be attached to these results. It seems to be a twentieth century axiom that anything can be proved by mathematical calculations. Our objection to the article is that it does not take into account that most important element — the psychological factor.

Examinations are written under most uncongenial and often strained circumstances. The slightest "malaise" has its repercussions upon the final results. A hurriedly partaken breakfast, a cold examination room, uncomfortable stools like those used in Miller Hall at the last examinations, the student's state of mind, these are but a few of the elements which tend to influence success in examinations.

The argument throughout is based upon an exact assessment of particular students' knowledge of their courses. It is very doubtful whether any such precise measurement is possible.

Technocracy Engineers Fail In Arithmetic

The progress of technocracy reminds us of a remark made by George Eliot in one of her essays. Referring to a German poet she said that his reputation was travelling around the world: it had already left Germany. Technocracy has reached Great Britain. Mr. Lloyd George, with his usual instinct for publicity, makes it the subject of an article in a London Sunday paper. He says that technocracy, or some similar theory, put into practice may save the world from utter chaos and ultimate revolution. Unfortunately for him the theory has already lost prestige in the United States.

The most thorough exposure of technocracy that we have seen is that by Mr. Simeon Strunsky in the New York Times Magazine. Howard Scott's theory has been sponsored by a group of engineers with headquarters in the engineering department of Columbia University. The first thing to be expected of an engineer is accuracy in the use of figures. But Mr. Strunsky shows again and again that technocracy's figures, even when basically correct, are distorted to the degree of the ridiculous in mere arithmetic. Not to put too fine a point on it, as Mr. Snagsby used to say, the material on technocracy does not read like an engineer making a report but like a politician trying hard to make a point.

A few of the figures put forward by those associated with technocracy will suffice. "A modern Minneapolis flour mill grinds 30,000 barrels a day per man." But Washington figures show that in 1929 the United States produced 154,000,000 barrels of flour. At the rate quoted for Minneapolis this flour would have been produced by the labor of seventeen men. Actually the milling industry in that year employed 27,028 men. Again: "A modern straight line continuous brick plant will produce 400,000 bricks a day per man." Washington figures show that eight billion bricks were produced in 1929. At the quoted rate they all could have been put out by sixty-eight men. But in 1929 the number of brick makers in the United States was about 35,000. Is it conceivable that American manufacturers would pay wages to 27,000 flour mill workers when they could get along with 17, or wages to 35,000 brick workers when they needed less than 100? Authentic figures show that in 50 years the production of pig iron has increased 23 times and not 650 times as claimed by technocracy: that the production of electric light bulbs in 15 years has increased about 30 fold and not 9,000 fold, etc., etc.

As Mr. Strunsky points out, if technocracy had stuck to the real rate of increased production by machinery no one would get excited. But the effect is different when increased efficiency per man is put at 3,000 times and 9,000 times and in the case of a steam turbine at 9,000,000 times. The passing vogue of technocracy is explained by the impact of enormously inflated statistics upon the frayed nerves of a sick world. Like the Fat Boy in Pickwick it sets out to make the flesh creep.—Mail and Empire.

Handshakes

Few of us stop to ask ourselves, if we do this simple thing properly; "even your best friend won't tell you" certainly applies in this case. Is that handshake of yours firm enough? Does it cause icy tremors to run up and down the back of the person you shake hands with. Is it what is commonly called a 'fish hand,' or again is it the 'vise-grip.'

Dickens very aptly describes the former when in David Copperfield he says "and then he gave me his hand which I did not know what to do with, for it did nothing for itself." This is a perfect description of a "fishy" handshake. The party concerned extends his hand gingerly, places it in yours, and waits for you to squeeze it.

He possibly doesn't realize that it feels worse than a wet sponge in one's hand, or he possibly wouldn't shake hands at all. Scientists have been known to state that this form of handshake is a token of weak character. If so, don't expose yourself to this criticism. Get yourself a handshake. Put a little feeling into your fingers when you extend that hand of yours for the other fellow to shake. Make the act seem mutual and not too one-sided. We have often stopped to ask ourselves what happens when two individuals with this type of handshake greet each other.

Then there's the other extreme. The chap who leaves you feeling as though your fingers will never come apart. Your finger bones feel as if they have been through a thumbscrew. You probably prefer this to the 'fish grip' but unfortunately it is a trifle more hurtful.

Surely a handshake is not too difficult a thing to do properly; one can easily break oneself of doing it improperly. Ask the next chap you shake hands with if your grip is right. Convention calls for handshaking as it calls for table manners, and to go about either without first consulting the demands of good taste, is to invite loss of social prestige.

ence. He was also recently invited to McGill University to lecture on Social issues.

Professor Havelock may be considered as one of the younger Canadian poets; his verse has appeared in Canadian Journals and also has been included in the Hymnal of the Student Christian Movement.

David A. McLennan is a recent graduate of Manitoba in Arts and Theology. As an undergraduate, he was for three years editor of the Manitoban and prominent in debating and dramatics. In 1923 he was gold medalist in Oratory. Since graduation he has been minister of churches in Boston, Baltimore, and Montreal. Last summer he was special preacher for two months in London's famous City Temple. Mr. McLennan combines wit and wisdom with a rare appreciation of the student mind.

Rev. D. K. Faris, is a Queen's graduate of 1924. While an undergraduate he was actively interested in student organizations. Since then he has spent six years in China as a Christian Missionary. Home on furlough, he is now attending Ontario Agricultural College. He belongs to that group of modern Christians who strive for improvement of physical condition for the people among whom they work. One of the leaders at the Elgin House Conference, Mr. Faris, will have something to offer the students at Queen's.

Professor Norman Rogers is a native of Amherst, Nova Scotia. An undergraduate in Acadia University from 1912 to 1915, he then enlisted for service in the Great War. From 1920 until 1923 he was Rhodes Scholar at Oxford, where he gained the degrees of M.A., B.Litt., B.C.L. For the next four years he was Professor of History at Acadia University. In 1927 he became parliamentary private secretary to the Prime Minister at Ottawa, when he came to Queen's in 1930, as Associate Professor in Economics and History. He is now devoting his full time to Political Science.

Professor Rogers has shown a keen interest in the Political and Debating Union, and introduced there the parliamentary style of debating.

The Journal has received from the University Librarian a list of books which are especially recommended for student readers. We have referred to this list in a previous issue, but it is, perhaps, advisable at this time to reprint the list, which includes a few words regarding each book.

Borrow, G.—Lavengro: The Romany Rye.

A tale in two volumes, strange in style, filled with hints of odd learning; but splendidly dramatic and having in Isopel Berners a character of tragic beauty.

Boswell, J.—Life of Johnson.

Perhaps the greatest biography in the language, a picture of the time and its manners, a picture also of a great and wise man and his intimates.

Butler, Samuel—The Way of All Flesh.

A novel of the Victorian England. Cruel, cynical, brilliant and almost an auto-biography.

Cellini, B.—Life.

The Italian Renaissance in flower; boastful, passionate, quarrelsome, pre-occupied with beauty in all its forms.

Cobbett, W.—Rural Rides.

Early 19th century England. A charming picture of social and domestic country life.

Conrad, Joseph—Victory.

A tale of the East Indies with an atmosphere of courage, sacrifice and suspense.

Davies, W. H.—Autobiography of a Super-Tramp.

The Odyssey of the Road. A strange tale by a lover of men and nature—a poet of distinction.

French, J. C.—Himalayan Art.

The title gives little hint of the fascination in this book. There are tales of travel, stories of old India, ghosts, and fascinating pictures.

Galsworthy, John—The Forsyte Saga.

Social England in the Victoria era. A great novel of almost painful force and exactness.

Farstin, Crosbie—The Dragon and the Lotus.

One of the most amusing of modern travel books: The Far East by way of the U.S., finishing in Assam.

Hardy, T.—The Dynasts, 3 vols.

The epic drama of Napoleon's rise and fall. Wonderful scenes that gave more knowledge of those great days than many histories.

Hudson, W. H.—Green Mansions.

A lovely story of South America. The heroine, Rima, is one of the beloved figures of modern literature.

Hosie, Lady—Portrait of a Chinese Lady.

An intimate and fragrant account of the real Chinese. We gain such knowledge of the family as to make us concerned for the possible fate in the "new China" of such delightful people.

Housman, A. E.—A Shropshire Lad.

Poems combining the highest technical skill with intense love of beauty and wonderful insight.

Ibsen, H.—Peer Gynt.

A drama, poetical in form, Norwegian in scene, but of universal application. A man's wasted life redeemed in the end by love.

Jones, E.—The Road to En-Dor.

A war book. English prisoners in Turkey stage a gigantic "sell" and get away with it.

Kinglake, A.—Eothen.

Travel in the near East. One of the "classics" of adventure.

Kipling, R.—Kim.

Lamb, C.—Esays of Elia.

Gentle, whimsical, beautiful and humorous, these essays carry the commendation of a century.

Lubbock, B. — Round the Horn before the Mast.

In a sailing ship, as an apprentice. A great tale.

Malory, Sir T.—Morte d'Arthur.

The Knights of the Table Round. Fights and miracles, wizardry and adventures, in joyous and vivid prose.

Mitchison, N.—The Conquered.

The Roman conquest of Britain, and a British chief's adventures as a slave in Rome.

Pater, W.—Greek Studies.

Essays on Greek thought and art; should be read for their beautiful style no less than for their authority.

Pepys, S.—Diary.

The social history of the English court and stage from 1658 to 1668. Written by the Secretary to the Admiralty, who was a lover of good living, scandal, and the other sex.

Scott, Capt. R. F.—Last Journey.

Will always be one of the greatest stories in the world. A failure more glorious than any success could have been.

Seely, Sir J. B.—Adventure.

Modern life, including the War, in which the writer commanded Canadian cavalry. Told with tremendous zest.

Stevenson, R. L.—Travels with a donkey in the Cevennes.

Modestine becomes the friend of every reader—bad as she was. Charming descriptions and perfect style.

Whitman, W.—Leaves of Grass

These free poems are an introduction to the American spirit, and the "Song of myself" raised the standard of U.S. poetry.

Avertin

There is a belief, handed down from relatively ancient times, that the conduction of this department for one year without mention of anaesthetica is tantamount to a confession of hopeless inefficiency on the part of the editors. Hence this eulogy on the merits of Euphoria's youngest handmaiden, Avertin. Her structural formula is a sight to behold but her descriptive nickname, tribromethanol, is more easily remembered.

To try anything once is not enough for the most thorough profession. Trying everything a thousand times before recognising it officially is the system that keeps progress accurately directioned. Therefore, in November 1930, The American Medical Association Council on pharmacy and chemistry decided that Avertin should not be admitted to 'New and Unofficial remedies' until its properties, advantages and disadvantages, contraindications and administration technique had been more fully studied.

In the Canadian Medical Association Journal for November last, Wesley Bourne of Montreal writes that "Since that date so much valuable information has been published that it would seem that these requirements have been fully met.

"To begin with, nobody any longer entertains the idea of producing complete anaesthesia with tribromethanol, although it does occasionally occur, but one rather thinks of avertin as a most salutory adjunct in the production of full narcosis.

"Although the respirating centre is depressed with specificity, yet this does not become a serious matter when recognized doses are adhered to, and when the substance is given slowly. Further, we have at our disposal the use of CO_2 and ephedrine, which latter will interrupt or considerably shorten avertin anaesthesia through its stimulating action on the central nervous system, circulation, and respiration. This has been shown to be the case in the dog and in man. Again, let us remember that avertin causes no irritation of the lungs or upper respiratory passages.

"The question of acidosis may next be considered. Our (Mr. Bourne's) findings are convincing in that the CO_2 combining power of the plasma as well as pH determinarion were made. Both sets of figures point to a mild acidosis which compares very favourably with that of ether. The acidosis is probably due to a disturbance of the phosphoric-lactic acid metabolism. There is a slight rise in blood sugar, but decidedly less than in the case of ether. Another effect on the blood is that which concerns its fluidity, and here we find an initial dilution followed by some concentration, whereas with ether there is concentration only, and to a greater extent.

"As heat regulation and water exchange are closely related, it is proper at this time to mention that the temperature of the body is lowered.

"It has been demonstrated that in dogs avertin causes an early anuria of short duration followed by oliguria and recovery within four to six hours, after which the urea percentage shows that the kidney function soon returns to normal. In human cases there is no evidence of severe kidney depression, due no doubt to the small dose employed.

"In view of the fact that there has been considerable conjecture about the effects of tribromethanol on the liver, it becomes a matter of considerable importance to know as exactly as possible the amount of harm done. By employing the bromsulphthalein test, it has been shown that normal dogs suffer slight and transient but no delayed liver damage and that in normal human beings there is no dye retention, supposedly on account of the 100 mgm. quantity. It has also been shown that repeated administration in normal dogs produces only a mild parenethymatrous degeneration, and very slight fatty changes occasionally occur. When the liver function in dogs is depressed by chloroform, and avertin is subsequently administered, the additional damage varies from 5 to 30% depending on the severity of the damage done by chloroform. This added liver impairment disappears within twenty-four to forty-eight hours and does not affect the total period of recovery from chloroform poisoning.

"From several clinics there are good reports, such as from Hans Widenhorn, of Frieburg, Germany, with more than 1,600 cases without mishap; Sir Francis Shipway, about 800 cases without regret; Wesley Bourne, 541 cases without the necessity of having to use ephedrine.

"In conclusion, it would seem that there are no contraindications to the use of this bromine substitution product of ethyl alcohol, provided that its dose is calculated to suit the use."

Perhaps we may be permitted from the lowly position of far undergraduatehood to offer some information obtained at first hand. Avertin is coming into very common use in some centres. There are surgeons who use it almost exclusively for anaesthesia in abdominal surgery. Patients who have undergone operations for appendectomy, etc., with this anaesthetic describe the experience as one of sinking easily to sleep, and awakening naturally with no nausea or gastric discomfort.

Perhaps in a few more years avertin will be found in the arsenal of every anaesthetist.

Eight Laps to "Betty Co-ed"

Every now and then some well-meaning educator "pops up" with a new wrinkle in teaching.

But Larry Snyder, varsity track coach and physical education instructor, has introduced the newest with the innovation of music for track classes.

Coach Snyder uses the public address system, and now all track aspirants, prance around the stadium to the rhythmic strains of popular college songs.

More Discoveries

Following the immortal Metchnikoff system of achieving knowledge by pure induction and producing experimental proof later, authorities on sociology have recently escaped many generations of physiologists. It has become known that by extension of the coxal and general articulations and the resultant elevation of the cerebral centres is conducive to an increase in the rate of the ratiocinational activities of the cortex, so that, with such bodily position, reading matter may be more rapidly absorbed and longer retained. This may lead in time to the elimination of seating fixtures from classrooms, offices, etc. And the old idea that quietness is necessary for concentration has been discarded. It is now recommended that libraries be situated over shooting galleries so that the necessary distraction may be provided, at least occasionally.

It may be that a fault has lain in the maintenance of an unhappy medium in posture. Further meditative research may reveal the possibility of a still greater increase in efficiency by the assumption of a position at the opposite extreme, that is, with the feet uppermost and all joints extended.

The universal adoption of the system must, of course, await corroboration of those theories by the actual experiments now in progress. T.R.

TUT, TUT, PROF!

New York — Young Professor Corwin D. Edwards told his economics class at Washington Square College, New York University, that they must read 18 books on social control of business. And he also told them to adopt a practical attitude toward labor problems.

The students, among themselves, demurred against the reading of 18 books. Finally Elinor Marshall, 17-year-old junior, stood up and acted as spokesman for the class.

"We believe," she said, "your assignment is unfair. We are taking a practical attitude toward labor problems. We are ready to reach a compromise through collective bargaining. If you don't agree I'm afraid there'll be a strike. We can of course, employ sabotage."

The professor compromised at six books.

More, Professor?

Independent Monthly Appears At McGill

"The Black Sheep," a new independent critical and literary magazine, will make its first appearance early next month upon the McGill campus. The publication is to be monthly, and three issues will appear during the present season. Subscriptions—at the rate of 25 cents for the three issues—have been on sale for the past four days, and the magazine is now well on its way to financial success.

"The Black Sheep" is not subject to the control or supervision of any student organization. It will devote itself to the printing of brief and pointed articles upon subjects of both university and general interest, and of brief writings of literary merit. Care will be taken to avoid anything of a pseudo-intellectual nature, such as has characterized certain student publications in the past. Each issue will contain eight pages.

The editorial board of the magazine was announced over the week-end. It consists of William Barclay, a graduate in Commerce, former Editor-in-chief of the McGill Daily, and former Managing Editor of the McGill Annual; Jessie MacLeod, Vice-President of the English Literature Society, and Secretary-Treasurer of R. V. C. '33, and Rachmiel Levine, medical upperclassman who has been connected with the feature department of the McGill Daily for several years. Ernest Carter, President of the German Club, is Managing Editor.

When questioned by the McGill Daily, those connected with this venture stated emphatically that "The Black Sheep" would make its three appearances without fail. The subscriptions are selling well, and the magazine is understood to have private financial backing.

Wily Ithacans

An English professor at Cornell informed his class that he had discovered an essay which had been copied word for word from the preface of a textbook not used by that class. With utmost severity, he ordered the offender to see him after class, adding that he would omit the mention of his name in the classroom if the student would present himself after class. After the dismissal he found himself face to face with five individuals.

AT THE CAPITOL

THREE ON A MATCH
Joan Blondell, Bette Davis, Anne Dvorak, Warren Williams

With a post-war and pre-depression theme, Three on a Match runs the gamut of emotions with Anne Dvorak as a young, wealthy, discontented society matron, and Joan Blondell and Bette Davis as the sympathetic school-friends, who step into the breach when Anne suddenly decides not to sail to Europe, and disappears into New York's gangland, small son and all. Joan plays the Samaritan and restores the youngster to his father (Warren Williams). Events follow rapidly, including kidnapping, blackmail, divorce and remarriage to the attractive Joan.

The picture gives a splendid resumé of events from the close of the Great War to the late twenties by showing the front pages of all the prominent newspapers. Each one is a story in itself, and when they run in series, it's like a history lecture and journalism course combined.

The three attractive stars, Joan Blondell, Bette Davis and Anne Dvorak, add piquancy to the picture with their distinctly different personalities. The petite and quiet Bette outshines her more sophistricated sister stars. But despite these virtues the picture lacks organization and selection, and on the whole represents a confused jumble of New York life. B.

HE LEARNED ABOUT WOMEN
with
Stuart Erwin, Alison Skipworth, and Susan Fleming

"He Learned About Women" is, on the whole, amusing enough for recommendation. There is a praiseworthy attempt at continuity in this talkie, and the action, which threatens to lag towards the end, takes a sudden spurt for an ingenious wind-up.

The plot: An earnest young man, (Stuart Erwin), who has led the life of an anchorite in his library, becomes heir to $50,000. His lawyer appoints a social secretary who is to show him the gayer side of life and apply a little varnish to the young innocent. Presently, into the conservative Fifth Avenue home of the young man, come an old vaudeville trooper with shreds of dramatic grandeur still clinging to her, (Alison Skipworth) and her pseudo-daughter, a girl out of work (Susan Fleming). Their plan is to take advantage of the young millionaire's ingenuousness, and conclude a marriage. What happens when the girl actually falls in love with her intended victim, (anyone could be amorous where $50,000 was concerned) is worth going to see. B.

Art Exhibit

An artistic zoo composed entirely of animal and bird colour wood block prints by Hauddruck can now be visited in room 111 of the Douglas Library.

The prints are mainly done in low colour tone and are a beautiful series of space fillings—that is the artist has taken a certain space on paper and filled it with a pattern. There are many different viewpoints in making a picture. The artist can be entirely concerned in suggesting volume and form or he can approach the subject from a realistic point of view—that is portraying nature as it looks or again he may be decorative. These prints are done in a decorative manner based on realism. They are full of vitality and animation with a great rendering of movement. They show the same principle of line arrangement and design as was applied to landscape by the late Canadian Artist, J. E. H. McDonald. So much for the artistry.

From the zoological viewpoint the animals and birds will now be classified according to the regions from which they come. The far North is represented by a print showing a group of seals swimming in a heavily rolling sea. Then a little further south we find a pack of wolves slinking through the trees, —better watch out originator of "wolf week." From prairie regions there are two fat turkeys which remind one of a certain dinner not long ago. From temperate zone civilized areas we find a group of puppies busily feeding out of a bowl and a soft furry little kitten. An amusing print shows two cocks just about to fight. One is jet black and looks the stronger, but the little brown one on the left may win—who can tell? Whippet hounds with their long legs seem prepared for a race (Note how the artist has a white one in front a black one in the centre and a gray one standing behind. Each has a bright red collar which adds just that dash of necessary colour). Next we see a young deer being attacked by an eagle, arab warriors are riding madly around on their fine black horses for no good reason at all. Lizards and camels show that we are getting further south nearer the equator.

And now Africa speaks through a print depicting curly haired darkies with bows and arrows shooting at a leopard perched high in a tree. Watch out! watch out! here comes a lion with his tawny main and fierce strength glowering over the landscape. Monkeys and red and blue parrots hover in the background. Oh look! there are a group of zebras over there kicking up their heels and having a very frisky time.

It is interesting to note the colours that the artist has associated with the different animals. Gray is the colour connected with seals, wolves, one of the hounds and deer. Black with the darkies and cock; red and blue with the parrots; brownish yellow with the lion, camel and leopard; green with the lizard and brown with the monkey.

Now alas the visit is over but the animals will be there tomorrow and for the next two weeks. Come-all you appendix probers, acid boilers date remembrers, and for sign jabberers—Visit the artistic zoo—and that goes for you too—fossil finders, mineral grinders, figure jugglers and equation balancers, and the others of our clan.

Dual Swimming Meet To Be Held Shortly

There is to be a dual swimming meet at Queen's shortly, the Journal learned yesterday. In addition to the Interfaculty Swimming Match, the date for which has not yet been definitely announced, there is to be on the same evening a meet between Albert College and the Kingston Y.M.C.A. here.

The interfaculty swimming is open to any member of any faculty of Queen's. Names should be handed to faculty managers; these are: for Medicine, F. O'Connor, for Arts, C. G. O'Neill, for Science, Fred Myers.

Information concerning the Albert College-Y.M.C.A. meet may be had from Mr. Brockel of the Y.M.C.A. and a detailed announcement will be published soon.

The highlight of the evening will be the diving exhibition by Queen's. Among the performers will be Don McKerracher, Ken Southern, Tony Forsberg, Clark Ross, Park Howard and two headliners from Levana, Jean Nelson and Libby Cameron.

The program for Interfaculty Swimming is as follows:

1. 50 yds. free style.
2. Novelty.
3. 100 yds. free style.
4. 200 yds. breast stroke.
5. Diving. 4 compulsory dives — swan, frontjack, backdive, iskander; 1 optional dive.
6. 440 yds. free style.
7. 50 yds. back stroke.
8. Diving exhibition.

Despite announcements to the contrary, the meet will take place early in the week after next.

Senior Basketballers To Tackle R. M. C.

The Tricolor Senior Basketball squad, having practised religiously and strenuously for some weeks will get a taste of exhibition warfare tomorrow afternoon. Manager Jack Finley reports that a test game has been arranged with R.M.C. Cadets for 3 p.m.

Having had little publicity to date because workouts, however numerous and important, are not so interesting to report. The seniors will likely have a large crowd on hand to view their stuff.

While the game means nothing, it will serve to demonstrate the condition and progress of the squad to date and will give the fans an idea of our team's chances in the big race.

It should be remembered that R.M.C. are entered in a Senior "B" group with Ont. Agricultural College of Guelph, and McMaster University of Hamilton. The winner of this group will likely meet the winners of the Intercollegiate senior series to decide the higher educational title. Fans therefore will get an inkling as to the strengths of the two divisions.

For an exhibition game, it should be very interesting, and the students should not pass it up.

Senior Hockey Team To Perform To-Night

With the victory of the Juniors to spur them on, the Queen's Senior "B" team gets the opening test to-night when they clash with Kingston.

Coach Elmer has finally chopped off his unwieldy squad and has concentrated on a team to carry the banners. He is satisfied that they will come through and duplicate the win of the Juniors.

Daniels will be in goal, and the defence will be ably looked after by Storms and Kostuik, with Teague in reserve.

Left wing will be occupied by Bill Carr, with Capstik ready to relieve him. Centre will be looked after by Arthurs with Murphy in reserve, while right wing will be ably held down by Patterson with Sock Smith helping out. The spare goalie will be Mac Forsythe.

With the above lineup the fans can be assured of a battling team, that will ably uphold the fame of other Tricolor hockey teams in days gone by and if they get the support they deserve, they should show plenty.

Kingston will line up with Gowsell in goal. Bentley, Roberts, Joyce and Murray on the defence, and Wilson, Bellringer, Card, Thurlby, Muchmore and Nicholson along the front line.

It looks like a real battle and the Kingston fans will be looking for revenge for the defeat suffered by their Juniors on Wednesday.

Skin

A California radio entertainer, according to the Loyolan campus publication of Loyola University of Los Angeles, remarked that the present day college man has three desires: first, the pig skin, second, the sheep skin; and last, the skin you love to touch.

SPORTS SLANTS

Junior hockey certainly pleases the crowds. Wednesday's game was as ding dong a thrilling struggle as the town has witnessed in Junior hockey. The teams are full value for their money and they will pack the rink on their next appearance.

Wing turned in a splendid game. He played fifty minutes before he took his first rest and he was going plenty fast at the finish.

Don't forget this goal James. He stopped a few and no fooling.

The student attendance wasn't bad, but there were many away. They missed a real evening of hockey and a chance to cheer on the team.

Queen's Junior Triumph In Hard Fought Struggle

that required brushing up on and they will get it.

Only three penalties marred the good work of the players all for minor offenses but two gory incidents threatened to be serious. The Kingston goalie Sharpe took a lift on the cheek and had to retire for repairs, while Christie of Queen's had a narrow escape from losing an eye when Gordon of Kingston lifted the puck at short range. Fortunately the puck hit the eye on the flat side and the wound isn't serious.

The first period went scoreless though both teams missed goals chiefly through over anxiousness. Wally started Christie, Brydon and McQuaig as a front line, with Wing and Smith in front of James in goal. A second line of Corrigan, Lewis and Bain also went well though later in the game he used Gibson on defence with Smith and Wing was placed at centre.

The second period hadn't been in progress very long when Christie got a nice goal for Queen's in 2 minutes. Lewis of Queen's got a penalty for stretching Samson of Kingston out and while he was repenting the Limestonites tied the score, Samson doing the trick.

Perhaps that didn't pep things up and everyone was being well and duly bumped. Wing caught Sharpe of Kingston dozing when he led a long low hard drive go from centre ice to again put the Tricolor ahead. It was the only lapse on the part of the Kingston goalie all evening.

Laird of Kingston again tied it up, on a peculiar play. He rounded Smith on the Queen's defence, who slipped at the wrong time. Kingston got tired of tying the score all the time and forged ahead when Catlin took a pass from Murray.

But that wouldn't do, and Wally moved Wing up to centre, Gibson helping out Smith on defence. Bain again tied it up when he took a pass from Wing, and the period ended 3 all.

As the teams came out for the third spasm, a few loyal souls tried a Queen's yell, the first of the evening. It helped to break the ice and more came later. However, don't think the crowd wasn't yelling something or other. This game was a pip.

Bishop of Kingston gave the fans something to rave over when he put one past James. And they have to be in close to get by this boy James. He played a whale of a game in the Queen's nets. He gets the medals.

Wing who had been banging pucks at the Kingston net all evening slipped in another in 9 minutes to knot the count and it remained knotted until the second overtime.

The first overtime went by with plenty of action but no scoring although the crowd was seared on numerous occasions. The second session got nicely started when Wing again seored and it looked like a Queen's win right there. All we had to do was tie Kingston up for a few minutes. But try and do it. Catlin got busy and had the puck in the Queen's net before we knew what it was all about, and we were in for some more overtime.

However, as related McQuaig and Wing combined to beat Sharpe in the third overtime period and the gang worked like fury to hold the lead. The final honk was sweet music to a lot of weary players.

Referee Bill Watts of Kingston handled the game well. He doesn't believe in ringing the bell too much but he likes a clean game and made it so.

Book Chats

By R.M.

Turning from the field of fiction for a spell, we would ask your consideration of a brief criticism on one of the greatest poems of modern times, Robert Bridges' "Testament of Beauty."

On the whole, what I have to say is impressionistic, and intentionally so; for great beauty absorbs us in its sensuous surface, not its content. Enthusiasm is contagious; better to be enthusiastic and impressionistic, than apathetic and erudite. What technical analysis there is, is presented with view to the development of esthetic judgment as the true road to appreciation.

Robert Bridges poem, The Testament of Beauty, is significant at once for its title. It is so to speak, Mr. Bridges' last will and testament on the subject of beauty. The poem is over 190 pages long and is divided into four books: Introduction, Selfhood, Breed, and Ethick. By Selfhood, Mr. Bridges means the self-assertive instinct; while Breed denotes sex. Book II traces the evolution of Selfhood to altruism or disinterested benevolence and in this development Motherhood plays an important part. Book III deals with the transformation of Breed into spiritual love. In the fourth book the poet treats of the origin of duty, the place of pleasure in the good life, disposition, education, and the relation of Reason to Beauty.

It is undoubtedly true that every great artist is concerned with content as well as form; but personally, I like poetry because of its appeal to the senses in rhythm, verbal music and word-pictures. After reading The Testament of Beauty, however, I am forced to the conclusion that its greatness lies in what it teaches. Nevertheless, there are about 800 lines out of the 4373 lines in the poem that are of true poetic quality. The best passage in the book is, I think, that beginning at page one and continuing to the bottom of page fifteen. Narrowing the focus still smaller let us examine the following nineteen lines at first hand:

"The sky's unresting cloudland, with varying play
sifteth the sunlight thru' its figured shades, that now stand in massiv range, cumulated stupendous mountainous snowhillowy up-piled in dazzling sheen, now like sailing ships on a calm ocean drifting, now scatter'd wispy waifs, that neath the eager blaze disperse in air; or now parcelling the icy inane highspredd in fine diaper of silver and mother-of-pearl freaking the intense azure; now scurrying close o'erhead, wild ink-hued random racers that fling sheeted rain gustily, and with garish bows laughing o'errarch the land or if the spirit of storm be abroad huge molten glooms mount on the horizon stealthily, and gathering as they climb deep-freighted with live lightning, thunder and drenching flood rebuff the winds, and with black purpling terror impend til they be driven away when grave night peacefully clearing her heavenly rondure of its turbid veils layeth bare the playthings of Creation's babyhood; and the immortal fireballs of her uttermost space
twinkle like friendly rushlights on the countryside."

I have selected this passage because of its personal appeal. Something akin to Wordsworth's poetry is, certainly, discernible here, and that may be partly why I was predisposed to favour these lines. But there is a more fundamental reason than that—there seems to be a spirit of serenity, the expression of a mind in complete harmony with the universe and acutely sympathetic to just those aspects of nature that every man can observe and appreciate. I know I have often studied "the sky's unresting cloudland" and tried to find adequate language to give expression to my feelings. In the contemplation of clouds alone there is a wonderful fascination. How many of us have thrilled through and through at the grandeur of a storm cast sky where "wild ink-hued random racers" scurry across and "fling sheeted rain" down on the earth.

Psychological investigations in recent years, have revealed that certain vowels and consonants are pleasant to the ear, while others are unpleasant. Thus l, r, t, d, m, are the most musical of the consonants and a, e, are the most pleasing vowels. The most unpleasant consonants are g, v, k, s, followed by oi, aw, and u, the harshest sounding vowels.

Turning to the lines quoted above, it is found that the liquid l's contained in "cloudland" and "play" give a pleasing effect. In line two there is a good example of alliteration in the repition of the initial 's' in "sifteth", "sunlight", and "shades". The 'r' sounds in line eight, recurring five times add pleasure to sense. It is interesting to note, too, that the poet has used the most unpleasant consonant 'g' to give vigor to his style (line eleven).

Love of rhythm has always been more or less inherent in man. The rude savage satisfies this appetency by his primitive music. In poetry regular recurrence of stress, subtly varied to suit the taste of our more civilized minds appenses the same elemental impulse.

Robert Burdges himself approaches Milton in his attempt to adopt for English verse a qualitative as well as a quantitative technique. "The poet in his loose alexandrines" writes generally in iambic hexameters, but the metrical arrangement is so subtly and continually varied that nothing short of a very detailed analysis would be adequate to explain the significance of Mr. Bridges' prosody.

The sensuous element colour (and sound as noted) is rarely found in this poem—and of course, it is only symbolized by the words. Mr. Bridges speaks of common flowers "waving in gay display their gold-heads to the sun." Much of his earlier poetry, however, is exquisite in its colourful word pictures of little plants and flowers. The imagery in "The Testament of Beauty" strikes me as lacking in vividness; yet the presentation of philosophical truths scarcely admits of concreteness in this respect. The main fact is that the poet has communicated his thoughts to us with clarity and forcefulness. He speaks of the "cloudland" that "sifteth the sunlight thru' its figured shades." Now, we have no clear or definite picture of a shade: It might mean a window shade, or a curtain of some kind. Still, to my mind the term shades expresses the idea that I feel but cannot quite put into words in contemplating cloud forms. The whole effect of a cloudy day is, indeed, a turbid, indefinite one, provoking images in the mind that are "stupendous" and "massiv."

Turning to the thought or the poem, one finds enough material for an encyclopedia of philosophy, it deals with epistemology, esthetics and ethics. A brief outline has already been given, but I might attempt to indicate a few of the pearls of wisdom that make this poem what it is—one of the greatest in our language. Mr. Bridges says in one place, "man's happiness is his loving response to the wealth of nature." This crystallizes a great truth. George Meredith, the novelist, has also emphasized the value of balance, sanity, fine health of mind and body and soul prescribed by nature. Beauty to Robert Bridges is: "That quality of appearances that thru the sense wakeneth spiritual emotion in the mind of man." He says, "Love's true passion is of immortal happiness." And, "virtue subserveth the soul's comfort and joy;" its attainment lies in constant practice which moulds conduct. After a season one "becometh to be his ideal" and is possessed of "a conscient personality and love of beauty."

The spirit which pervades this poem is one of serenity and repose exhibiting the steadfast faith and sincere convictions of a man who has moulded his intellect to his spirit; one who sees life whole and sees it clearly and like Wordsworth feels the power of a deity working in and through the universe. I feel that if Mr. Bridges had not adopted such unusual versification and spelling in his poem it might be ensured of a place among the poetry of all time. However, it may well be read and appreciated as a piece of pure prose some generations hence.

University Barter Plan

Oskaloosa, Iowa — Out of its current barter tuition plan, Penn College, Quaker institution, has evolved a comprehensive student "self help" program which will be put into operation next year.

This year's tuition receipts at Penn from students unable to pay cash included 13 head of cattle, 9 sheep, 27 hogs, 30 chickens, 1500 quarts of canned fruits, 25 bushels of apples, 20 bushels of potatoes, 250 bushels of corn and 25 bushels of wheat.

The resourceful college heads decided the college should operate a farm where it could employ students as part-time workers and utilize the fees. The cows now furnish milk for the college dining tables. The chickens contribute toward the egg supply. The porkers are doing their bit after fattening on the corn. The fruits and vegetables find their way direct to the tables.

Hair-Splitting

In the Haskell-Creighton gridiron battle the Indians made a substitution when the ball was on their own six-inch line, and as their limit of substitutions for the game was already exhausted, they were penalized half the distance to the goal, or three inches.

Queen's Quill
Reviewed by A. B. B.

The new Queen's Quill is out—and a very creditable issue it is too. Comprehensive and well-balanced in subject matter, replete with well-written and interesting material, it is a fine tribute to the energy and ability of the Quill editor and his staff. The gap in student literary expression at Queen's is admirably filled.

To criticize this periodical — or should one call it a periodical? is a difficult undertaking. Naturally, one does not expect to unearth "Some mute, inglorious Milton," but one would like to find some real originality portrayed. The reviewer does not refer so much to the originality of ideas—a really original idea is an exceedingly rare occurrence—but rather to the commonplace phraseology and sentence-structure of the work. Constantly, in reading the Quill, one is running up against sentences and phrases, re-hashed no doubt, but nevertheless more than faintly reminiscent of some well-known, previously read, piece of writing. This is possibly, however, the price of inexperience. The cover, probably a constant trial to the Quill staff, smacks unpleasantly of a high school magazine.

The poetry over the initials of M. H. F. shows real ability, and a definite original streak. In both "The Image" and "Adventurous Return" one senses the author's pleasing reverence for the simple things of life. In "The Image" a lovely cameo-like piece of poetry—the last line "And all my thoughts are candles round your feet" is a gem. A poem "Nativity" by E. H. G. is well worthy of comment. There is an ethereal beauty about this poem and a sense for the right word which is a pleasure to witness.

Four articles in this issue are particularly good. "Life in a German University" by Gerda Hellmund (the German exchange student at Queen's), and "The American University as Seen by a Canadian Student," by A. Gordon Miller, are fairly comprehensive, and give a very good idea of university life in Germany and the United States respectively. Miller's fairness to the American Universities and his lack of bias are to be commended "Daniel Fowler—A Pioneer Painter" by B. C. Robson is not only well-written, but in addition instructive. "Mainly About Operations" the work of L. E. Limoges gives one a fascinating birdseye view of the marvels of modern surgery. One is almost persuaded to become a doctor oneself. More articles of this nature, in the reviewer's opinion at any rate, would be welcome in future issues.

"Big Jim", a short story by J. D. Bateman, is very well done. The characterization of the old man is first rate—a real penetration of the human make-up. One can actually see him and after all that is the real test. But not only is the character-sketching clever but equally so the atmosphere of the story. Anyone who has been down a mine-shaft will testify to the truth of this statement. "C'est la Guerre" by Ontis is clever in idea, though possibly the style is a trifle stilted. J. H. Bell's contribution, "Way of Escape" is written in an easy, pleasant fashion. One would hate to see that drawing-room though—it sounds like a museum!

One regrets that one cannot review this magazine more fully. Other pieces of writing are well worthy of recognition—but alas, space does not permit. With one exception the "Quill" has achieved a considerably higher standard than it attained in its last issue. That exception is "The Strange Case of the Missing Appendix." In the reviewer's opinion it has no place in the "Queen's Quill." However, this is a purely personal opinion and it should not be taken too seriously.

Congratulations to the Quill staff—they have done "well and nobly." No doubt, in time they will have their portraits emblazoned on the walls of Grant Hall as benefactors of the University.

Campus and Gym

Playing the second of a series of games with University teams, the Levana team lost by a score of 6-2 to a Meds 38 team. The Freshmen outskated and out played the girls, but Jean Stewart put the Levana goals past the Freshman goalie.

Line-ups:

Levana—Margaret McGregor, Jean Nelson, Dot Clemens, Marg. Chambers, Jean Stewart, Jean Cameron, Ruby Cordy, Carmel Milne.

Meds '38—Collins, Yuill, Simpson, Forsythe, Lathan, Rhupert, Legris, Paterson, Johnson, Collick, MacIntyre.

The first of the year games will be held on Monday when Levana '35 meets Levana '34. The game will be played in the usual practice hour, from 1 to 2 o'clock. The two teams are evenly matched and should produce good hockey.

Hart House Quartet Plays Here To-Night

Toronto Ensemble Is Nationally Renowned

Kingstonians and students will be given one of the musical treats of the season this evening when the internationally famous Hart House Quartet makes its appearance in Grant Hall.

This organization has toured our dominion from coast to coast, has taken the United States by storm, and has received a wonderful reception on its European tours. But a prophet is without honour in his own country; and Canadians are lamentably ignorant of the work of their own great ensemble.

The first violinist, Geza de Krez was born a Hungarian, but he has become domiciled in this country, unstintingly giving of his musical talents to the cause of chamber music. All the other members of the quartet are musicians of virtuoso rank. Mr. Adaskin plays the second violin; Milton Blackstone, the viola, and Boris Hambourg, the 'cello.

César Frunck's Quartet in D, written about 1889, and Beethoven's Quartet in C. major op. 59 No. 3, composed around 1800, will constitute the programme. The first work requires forty-five minutes to perform; the second thirty.

To encourage students to attend the gallery will be reserved for them till 7.45. So there is no danger of not securing a seat.

Three Dramatic Guild Players in 'March Hares'

"March Hares" which is being presented by the Drama Group in the Technical Auditorium on Tuesday, January 17th, and which features three Queen's Dramatic Guild Players in leading roles is a comedy about temperamental young people.

Janet Rodney (Martha Johnson) and Geoffrey Wareham (Arthur Sutherland) are young elocution teachers who are also engaged to be married. They are extremely temperamental and always getting on each other's nerves. Janet, resenting Geoffrey's attitude of seeming indifference invites Claudia Kitts (Lee Browne) an "affinity" to visit her. To get even Geoffrey invited Edgar Fuller (Edmund Bullis) to visit him. In the dash that follows Geoffrey and Janet grow jealous of each other but Geoffrey finally declares himself and they are again happily engaged.

The other featured role is played by Mrs. Bruce Jemmett in the role of Mrs. Rodney and an excellent supporting cast surrounds these featured players.

B.W. F. SQUAD OPENS SEASON WITH WIN

S. C. M. CONFERENCE FEATURES WEEK-END

Socialists Firmly Against Present Economic System

Prof. Eric Havelock Gave First Lecture Of Week-end Series

"Socialists make no bones about confessing that they are against the present system, against private profit, and against patching," said Professor Eric Havelock, in the opening lecture of the S. C. M. Conference held here over the week-end.

On one question all Socialists agree: production for profit is inherently wrong. Hence the contempt with which Socialists are greeted. The Socialist creed includes the necessity for overturning the present order, and the substitution of primitive values for so-called "spiritual truths." Inequalities in wealth are denounced as bad, morally and spiritually. Equalization of opportunities for the disinherited is one of the principles of Socialism, and all Socialist principles are so fundamental that they must be fulfilled in fact, even at the expense of revolution.

"The gospels are basically revolutionary," continued Professor Havelock. "Thrift, saving and financial success are the pagan virtues of Protestantism, direct contradictions to the Gospel teaching that success is a vice."

Professor Havelock doubted the value of personal salvation, as stressed by the S.C.M. A personal religion is safe, but conservative. "The world will never be happy till Socialism is put into practice," said the speaker.

The discussion produced no defenders of laissez-faire ideology which absence of conservatism was a welcome feature of the whole conference.

Rev. D. K. Faris

"Missionary work, to be worthy of the name, must reach all classes of humanity," declared Rev. D. K. Faris, in an interesting address Sunday morning. Mr. Faris, who graduated from Queen's in 1934, has spent six years doing church work in China. His address was commentary on "Re-

Tricolor Preparations Proceeding Rapidly

Preparation of the Tricolor is now proceeding apace, the Journal learned yesterday.

Some delay is being occasioned, however, by reason of photographs and biographies which have not yet been handed in.

All concerned are asked by the Editors to make strenuous efforts to remedy this condition, so that the Year Book may come out early.

Queen's Quill Needs Your Financial Help

After brisk sales marking the initial day of publication, the Queen's Quill has not sold as well as the Editors hoped and a threatened decline in circulation is causing them some anxiety. The Medical Faculty in particular have not supported the Quill and sales have also proved most disappointing in Science.

Miss Mary Fraser, in charge of Circulation in an interview yesterday said, "Every literary affair like this has to have its ups and downs; but I can't see why Queen's students who boast of what they call "College Spirit" don't get behind this latest addition to Queen's efforts and help it survive."

Russian Impressed By Canadian Attitude

Dr. Krotkov Speaks At Levana Meeting

"The friendliness of the Canadians toward the foreigners in their country is one of the first things noticed by an immigrant," Dr. Krotkov told Levana in his address at a recent Levana meeting. When he spoke on "A Russian's Impressions of Canada." In his talk he also told of the difficulties that he had in entering Canada after his graduation from Prague University in Czechoslovakia. Dr. Krotkov also said that the Russians were under the impression that Canada was a very cold country, and also if coming to Canada to live one would have to bring a wife for there were no women to speak of in Canada.

Mrs. Gregory Vlastos also spoke on "The Personal Aspect of Religion," answering these three questions: Am I content to exist or do I require life? What is greater than my own innocuous living? What price am I willing to pay to master the art of living?

Miss Laird asked the girls to refrain from touching the floral decorations at the Ban Righ At-Home, at it would be quite an expense to the Levana Society if any damage were done to them.

"Russia" Subject Second Lecture Extension Series

Illustrated Lecture Given Yesterday By Head Of Arts Guild

In the second extension lecture of the year given in Convocation Hall, Mr. Clarke of the Guild of All Arts addressed the audience on the subject of Russia. The Hall was packed and the overflow stood along the aisles.

Mr. Clarke began his lecture by showing a map of Russia and pointing out that Kingston is not as far from Moscow than is the Eastern extremity of the U.S.S. R. Mr. Clarke had a very interesting and complete set of views of present day Russia. These he explained were taken with no intention of being incorporated into a lecture and represented an unbiased view of Russian life.

The Russian population has increased greatly during the past few years. This is not so much a result of an increased birth rate as of a decreased death rate, and a great wave of immigration. The immigration to Russia at the present time exceeds any known before, including even the great wave of immigration to America. Each week about 25,000 people arrive in Russia from other European countries.

The first five year plan which was the result of years of study and research by 33,000 engineers, economists and technicians, was the great objective of the Russian people, and the desire for individual distinction was met by publicly honouring any outstanding worker, and by a two weeks holiday.

The somewhat caustic and startling remarks of G. B. Shaw after his trip to Russia, were, in the opinion of Mr. Clarke, founded on more than the desire to be conspicuous and contain a great deal of truth.

In speaking about the attitude of Russia towards world peace and disarmament, Mr. Clarke felt sure that the Soviet Republic was gen-

Russia Is Ready To Trade With Canada

Canadian Attitude Bar To Agreement

"Russia is quite ready to enter into a trade agreement with Canada" stated H. Clarke in an interview with a Journal reporter, shortly before lecturing in Convocation Hall yesterday afternoon.

Russia already has commercial connections with other countries including Great Britain and the United States, Mr. Clarke pointed out, expressing the belief that the only obstacle to the completion of the deal is the attitude of the Canadian government.

If such a trade pact were to be arranged it would prove of great advantage to Canadian farmers, Mr. Clarke believed, and he attributed the present hold-up to the inability of the Canadian farmers to secure sufficient funds to procure the cattle. The Dominion Government has refused funds or credit and unless money is forthcoming from some other source the agreement would seem to be doomed.

Mr. Clarke declared that many exaggerated rumours concerning Russia are current. As an example of this he quoted the reports of Russian demonstrations so frequently described in the press of this continent. An American who lived in Russia for

Newman Club Hears Rev. Father Martin

Describes Cathedral At Lisieux, France

The first meeting of the Newman Club for the new year was held in K. of C. Hall last Sunday. A discussion was held regarding the advisability of holding a Dance and Bridge in the near future, the arrangements being left in the hands of the Social Committee.

Owing to illness Professor Conacher was unable to address the Club. Rev. Father Martin gave a very interesting description of Lisieux, France, which he visited while on the Continent. At present a vast Cathedral is being built there which will equal if not eclipse that of Lourdes. A vote of thanks was given for the address after which the meeting adjourned and refershments were served.

During the past week the regular Discussion Groups were held in St. James' Chapel. These will be continued next week at the regular hour and all Newman Club members are asked to attend.

Grant Hall Filled To Overflowing As Music Lovers Flock To Hear Hart House Quartet.

Those who have ears to hear and minds to appreciate must have enjoyed the recital given by the Hart House Quartet in Grant Hall last Friday evening. It is not too much to say that this great ensemble is to Canada what Kneisel's quartet was to the United States for over thirty years—the most outstanding exponent of chamber music in North America.

The first number played by the quartet was the quartet in D, composed in 1889 by the Belgian-French composer, César Franck. In this number there are reflected all the nebulous, mystical ideas of Franck's essentially religious nature. For over forty years he wrote cantatas and oratorios on religious themes and when the quartet was written he was organist at Ste. Clothilde in Paris. Franck's mode of thought, his intention is difficult to grasp, and one hearing of this number is

Ten Tricolor Fighters Victorious In First Assault Of Year At Ottawa

HENRY HOSKING

Who started another quest for honors with a decisive victory at Ottawa.

Peever's Sensational Battle With Crippen Feature Of Evening

Ottawa, Ont. — Ten Queen's boxers and wrestlers successfully carried the Tricolor to victory in the first Assault of the year at Ottawa on Saturday evening, when a capacity audience jammed the "Y" gym and witnessed a sparkling night's sport, finishing with a seven to three victory. The climax of the evening was a sensational one round knockout scored by Merve Peever over Eddie Crippen, the Madison Club star, and Ottawa City champion. Another notable victory scored for the Tricolor and the highlight of the wrestling events was the decisive win in two falls by Henry Hosking, the Queen's lightweight star, over C. Casserley, the heavyweight champion of the Capitol city.

Boxing

147 lbs. The final bout of the evening between Peever and Crippen was the chief centre of interest. Many close followers of boxing in Ottawa figured that Peever was booked for his Waterloo as Crippen had a most enviable record well sprinkled with knockouts. With the clang of the bell for the first round Crippen rushed from his corner with a flurry of punches that were neatly parried by Merve who then suddenly shot a terrific left and right to the body. Crippen halted in his tracks, gave Peever an opportunity to turn him around with a smart body twist and followed by a beautifully delivered right hand flush on the point of the jaw and for the first time in his career, the Ottawa boy took the long count.

145 lbs. Jack Ewen made his debut with an impressive win over J. Van Allen of Ottawa. Ewen chased his opponent all over the square, crowded him in every corner of the ring dealing out drastic punishment to win a decisive victory at the end of the third round.

126 lbs. Frosty Ennis, a newcomer making his initial start for Queen's showed unusual class and gave the classy Eddie Carrol, Madison club crack, a very close battle. Carroll earned the decision, but it was the Queen's boy who received the plaudits of the crowd for his classy display

Formal Ticket Sale Augury Of Success

Special Decorators Labor Every Night

Last week's announcement in these columns of the engagement of Ken Large and his "Knights of Sweet Music" has met with universal approval on the campus. The Arts Formal Committee has asserted that it is fully confident that Ken and his orchestra will meet the tastes of the most discriminating. For several nights past Ken has been playing special numbers for Queen's University in his C.K.A.C. programs at 5 o'clock each afternoon.

One of the most gratifying features of this year's Arts At Home is the advance sale of tickets. It is no secret that the committee has been pleasantly surprised to find the keen demand which has sprung up. Over half of the maximum number of tickets has already been taken up and with 10 days yet to go, it looks as if the issue will be oversubscribed. Apparently the Arts formal has resumed its former reputation of being the outstanding dance of the year.

A ballot box has been placed in the Arts Clubroom in which the receipts are to be left. According to the printed instructions purchasers are requested to print their lady's name and address as well as the names of the other members in their party on the back of the receipt forms and leave them in the clubroom. Early action in this regard will be appreciated by the committee.

In an interview with the "interior decorators" Bob Johnston, Walt Horn and Sun Major, the Journal was informed that several willing workers have been spending their evenings in the old gym. putting the various frames in order. Anyone who cares to drop in after 7 o'clock and lend a hand will be welcome. The freshmen will be asked to co-operate later on in the week.

Pick Your Type

Eminent beauty specialists assembled in convention in New York City some time ago, and came to the enlightening decision that feminine pulchritude can be divided into seven distinct types—the Psychic, the gold woman, the Diana, the flame, the flower, the Sphinx and the Madonna.

The Psychic type, we are informed, is a neutral blonde. Hers is an aristocratic and sophisticated charm. Her face is usually long, slender and narrow with high cheek bones. Her eyes are either blue or green. Her hair, one of her most distinguishing features, is sleek, well kept and worn close to her head. Restfulness and poise are the key-notes of her personality—a personality with the "suavité" of the most exquisite perfume.

The gold woman type is not to be misconstrued with the gold-digger who is not a type but a racketeer. She is the so wistfully frail, so young and so fair type. Her hair may be pale gold like a delicate nimbus, or pale brown—but it always has something of the quality of unreality, like sunlight through mists. Her eyes are gray or blue. The healthy pallor of her skin makes her dainty. Her face is round and baby-like. A most attractive type, indeed.

The Diana type offers more pitfalls to the would-be describer. She is essentially tall. Her figure is more accentuated by curves than the other types described. The forcefulness of her character is brought out by a marked squareness of face and somewhat hard curve of the cheek-lines. The Diana type has dark hair, eyes and strongly marked eyebrows. Perhaps this description does not sound flattering, but we learn that this type can achieve brilliant results with the good points nature has bestowed upon her.

The flame type "plays" with life and with people. Her eyes are noncomittal. Her skin is neither light nor dark, but is smooth. There is usually a little mysterious shadow about her eyes. Her cheeks are red with a rosiness in which there are no half measures, and the lips deep red. Her figure is neither slender nor heavy, yet she is happily endowed with curves.

Tall, slim, statuesque — these are the main features of the flower type. Her skin is smooth, like finely-woven satin, soft as the petals of a pansy. Then, with breath-taking contrast, her hair is a rich, living gold—no faded yellow, but the shade of yellow so popular with artists. Her lips are warm and inviting.

Piquancy is the greatest asset of the Sphinx type. There is a running gayish pertness in her features. She has a delicate, yet well chiseled profile. Pouting lips add much to her vivaciousness. A firm little chin proves that she knows what she wants and will get it. Your wares have to be good to make a sale with this type.

The Madonna type, in our opinion, is the least interesting of the group. We fail to appreciate her fine points—if any.

It is somewhat surprising that these specialists failed to accord a definite place to the auburn-haired beauty. Red haired belles are comprised, no doubt, in the flame and perhaps, Diana types. They also seem to have overlooked the Oriental brunette, the Southern belle, the Spanish brunette, and the water lily blonde.

It is only a matter of choice—pick your type.

Do It Now!

There are twenty-four hours in every day, seven days in every week, and so on ad infinitum. One minute today is of equal value to the same portion of time tomorrow, although values are continually changing. Price values jump up and down and play a highly skilled game of "hide-and-seek" with prosperity and depression, keeping everyone guessing as to what is coming next. Social values, as characterized in modes, fashions, conventions, and taboos, do not remain the same from one generation to the next.

While all other values are changing, the criterion of time remains forever the same. A minute is always a minute. Consequently, one is forced to realize that the last few minutes before finals are of absolutely the same value as the minutes before the Christmas holidays, and even before Thanksgiving. Then, why is it that students save their work until the last few minutes before the sound of the final gong? Suppose a time budget were put into effect and, as a result, each student should adopt as his policy that old, much worn, but still very practical phrase, "Do It Now!"

With "Do It Now" as the motto of every student, term papers would find themselves miraculously coming in on time. Reports and reviews would be started before the last-minute rush. Final time would no longer be the critical time in a student's life but would be only a necessary ordeal to mark the close of another eighteen weeks of work.

The Text Book Question

Among university students in this country, one frequently hears the following inquiry: "Why are there so many American textbooks used in Canadian colleges? Why not use more texts of Canadian origin and background?" One obvious answer to this question is that there are certain fields, especially in regard to the exact sciences, where nothing would be gained by substituting Canadian works for those which now adequately serve the purpose. It would be a misuse of patriotism to prescribe a text in physics of Canadian authorship to the exclusion of a superior American product. Naturally the same principle applies as well to other branches of learning.

In all probability much of the dissatisfaction, not to say resentment, in respect to the situation is found among students of economics and business. As a rule, such students are primarily concerned with Canadian problems. Consequently, they find it somewhat distasteful when they are required to read material on the United States Steel Corporation when they are more interested in Steel of Canada, to study the California Fruit Growers' Association to the exclusion of the Canadian Wheat Pool, or to analyze a balance sheet of General Electric while Massey-Harris is wholly neglected.

It is impossible for one not to sympathize with the students' point of view, and to deny the desirability of making greater use of Canadian material is futile. Nevertheless, something may be said in partial justification for the present situation. In the first place Canada's industrial and commercial development has been closely linked with that of the United States; therefore, there is a striking similarity between Canadian and American economic institutions. As a result, much of the material in American textbooks applies almost equally well to Canadian conditions. Possibly many of us would prefer to use English publications in preference to American, yet we would hesitate to face the necessity of calculating in terms of pounds, shillings and pence when texts using our own monetary terminology are available. In the second place, much of the material used is merely for purposes of illustration. Under such circumstances, there is no irreparable harm done if the Union Pacific instead of the Canadian Pacific were taken as an example. If the latter were used, however, one must admit that the interest of a Canadian student, in all probability, would be stimulated to a greater degree. In the third place, many Canadians do their research work in graduate schools of the United States, where there is little incentive or opportunity for them to write a book suitable for regular classroom use. In so far as they study Canadian problems, most of their energy is concentrated on some special phase of the question under consideration, with the result that any work which they might compile could be used only in advanced courses.

As a matter of fact, one of the most fundamental reasons for the deplorable dearth of Canadian textbooks is the extremely limited market for such publications. In the United States, with its hundreds of institutions of higher learning, there is a ready market for texts, even in the face of keen competition. For instance, every year several new textbooks, meritorious and otherwise, in the principles of economics, are published and sold in quantities sufficient at least to remunerate the publishers. Possibly the sales were stimulated as a result of instructors changing the text by way of relieving the monotony. No such opportunity is afforded in Canada. At present our universities and colleges are not large enough, or sufficiently numerous, to insure an adequate market for a textbook written primarily from a Canadian point of view, and such a work would have only a very restricted sale in U.S. and other parts of the world. Fortunately the situation is rapidly improving. With the growth in numbers of the Canadian student body and the progress which this country is destined to make socially, politically and economically, the market for textbooks, the sources of materials, and the number of competent authors will be increased so that the want which is now being expressed need not remain permanently unsatisfied.

THE POET'S CORNER

A new and strange pathology affects your physiology,
The modern doctor passes up the pills,
He might as well be dead as in the ancient school of medicine;
Prescriptions aren't given for your ills.
Your ankles, ears, and lungs and wrists are all assigned to specialists,
You find when you are sick there are a lot.
A flock of them take care of you,
and each one has a share of you;
They tell you what it is you haven't got.

Chorus

For the doctors do not doctor as they did,
When there's human overhauling to be done.
If you feel in bad condition, and you send for your physician,
You find that they have split him
ten for one.
No. The doctors do not doctor as they did,
They've discarded all the practices
so plain;
And when sicknesses defeat you,
there's an army comes to treat
you,
For every modern, morbid little pain

My wife enjoys the rheumatiz (at least we all assume it is)
Her doctors do not tell us, to be sure.
She visits twenty-one of them, and every mother's son of them
Is giving some instalment of the cure.
They check her plus and minuses and irrigate her sinuses:
She takes massage from one o'clock to three,
Her ankles get a daily broil; her legs get ukelele oil
That has to be injected at the knee.

Chorus.

No the doctors do not doctor as they did.
Now they say, they want her blood to be appraised.
If the vote goes Democratic, its her spleen that is erratic.
If Republican, her tariq should be raised.
Oh, the doctors and the doctoring
they do,
And the druggists carry everything but drugs.
When the germs begin to bite us, every freshman at St. Vitus
Gives three cheers for Alma

Hart House Quartet Review

hardly sufficient to fathom its intricacies. Adolfo Betti, eminent violinist, classes him in the modern school with Debussy which has introduced an orchestral element into quartet composition. That is, they strive for far-fetched effects like bag pipes sounding in the distance. Mr. de Kresz, the first violinist, expressed the opinion that Franck was trying to portray the clash of the good elements in life with the bad, in the last movement. He compared the scherzo movement to the choral symphony of Beethoven's, with its rugged statement of the theme.

What this critic noticed particularly, in the scherzo movement, was the consummate artistry displayed in rapid spiccato bowing and pure intonation. This was followed by the fourth and last movement in slow stately tempo, marked by a melancholy mood, which recapitulates the substance of the work. The absolute pitch attained in double stop harmony passages was delightful. One of the distinctive features of this composition is the prominence given the viola which was regarded as an inferior instrument in the works of the classicists —probably because the 'alto' players were failures in the G clef. But César Franck requires a finished technique, and Mr. Blackstone played the double stop passages with beauty and assurance. For that matter, the first inside voice (2nd violin) and the second "outer" voice, the cello, displayed masterly technique and sympathetic interpretation. Geza de Kresz, the first violinst is undoubtedly a virtuoso artist of the first rank and possesses that spiritual insight into the meaning of a composition that is the highest criterion of a string quartet musician. His brilliant singing tone, sure attack and accent were especially appreciated.

The third Rasoumovsky quartet in C major immediately followed. This number belongs to the Romantic period when Beethoven had cast off the classical influences of the Mozart school and begun to experiment with polyphony. Chamber music has been compared to an interweaving of scarlet with gold and purple threads. This simile can be very appropriately applied to a Beethoven quartet with its elaborate intertwining of melodies. For the best interpretation of this quartet, there must be co-ordination in expression, purity of intonation, absolute balance and significant marking of rhythmic and tonal nuances.

In direct antithesis to the austere beauty of César Franck's quartet, this number is animated with a fanciful, airy spirit. The first movement in andante and allegro-vivace tempos commenced with a statement of the theme in the first violin, graced with a beautiful trill, and was repeated in the other instruments successively. Then followed a perfect harmony passage with the melody in the viola and second violin while the two outer voices marked the rhythm. Geza de Kresz's spiccato bowing was a feature of this movement. The second movement (andante conmoto) opened with first and second violins carrying the melody accompanied by Boris Hambourg in pizzicato style on the cello. The counter-point passage, with three different melodies in viola, first and second violins, was appreciated for its balance and beauty. The flowing movement, brilliancy, and purity of tone, characteristic of Geza de Kresz's playing throughout was a delight to the ear. Harry Adaskin, second violinist, came in for some solo work and charmed with the warmth and feeling of his interpretation. The movement ended with pizzicato measures reminiscent of Dvorák.

The third (minuetto) movement was well executed. I have heard the criticism that there was a lack of smoothness in transitions, but would not substantiate this. For it seemed to me the run begun in the first violin was carried on by the cello without a break in the first phase of this movement. The bowing was excellent on the whole, staccato (detached) alternating with spiccato (how off strings). Logical piecedness of structure is characteristic of this throughout. What I enjoyed most in the Beethoven number was the fugue movement. The complicated melodic arrangements of this part of the quartet require real co-ordination and balance. The Hart Honse ensemble gave a masterly interpretation. One found the repetitions: viola, second violin, cello, first violin and vice versa very pleasing. The change of theme and modulation in key added to the beauty of the passage.

The criticism has been made, anent the programme of this recital, that "a large percentage of the young people present Friday evening had never heard a first-rate string quartet before, and that they knew nothing or little of musical form." It seems to us that the accent should not necessarily be put on the students as musical ignoramuses. A far greater number appreciated the recital last Friday than the above writer is aware of. Cultivation in music indeed can only be promoted by educating the music lover to the best, and if a composition is a little too difficult to grasp completely why that is only an inducement to musical appreciation.

Math. Experts Hear Professor W.C. Baker

The Math. and Physics Club held a very interesting and well attended meeting recently in room 202, Ontario Hall. Mr. J. R. Kent presided and introduced the speaker, Prof. W. C. Baker, Honorary President of the Club. The subject of Professor Baker's address was "A New Experiment on the Nature of Time." First dealing with the Faraday conception of electric tubes representing stresses in an all-pervading ether, the speaker stated that, following the advent of the electromagnetic theory, scientists were concerned with questions relating to the relative motion of ether and terrestrial objects. Dwelling briefly on the famous Michelson-Morley experiment, and others in this field, Prof. Baker then told of the Fitzgerald-Lorenz contraction. According to this hypothesis all bodies on the earth's surface suffer a contraction in the direction of their motion relative to the ether. This led on to Einstein's theory of relativity. To establish experimentally the relativity of time, Keunedy and Thorndike performed a very brilliant and accurate test employing the phenomena of interference of light, the results of which could only be explained if time on a moving clock depended again on the Fitzgerald-Lorenz contraction.

Musically Speaking

By R. N.

"Such harmony is in immortal souls
But whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close it in we cannot hear it."

I tried to enjoy the César Franck Quartet last Friday night. But this muddy vesture shut out the strains of violins, viola and cello; the music was denied me. But the fates must have been with me Wednesday night. For never have I enjoyed music in such measure as I did at this the fourth meeting of the Kingston Music Group.

* * * *

I look back, therefore to Wednesday night as a great experience. I have heard fine pianists, the best the world has to offer, but never, and I can say this without flattery, have I enjoyed piano music so much as I did that concerto of Beethoven. I knew nothing of its structure, nor where to find the theme, nor how to appreciate the harmony or the rhythm or precision of timing, all I could express in my notes, all I can feel now is that it was "wonderful"!

* * * *

It was a great treat to hear the Peer Gynt Suite rendered in an eight-hand piano arrangement. Miss Baker, Mrs. Tracy, Miss Smith and Miss Knight played. I was particularly interested to note how well the orchestral effects were reproduced in the piano. Under the high notes which, like the winds and reeds told of swallows twittering in straw built sheds and larks arising to wing the sky, were the deep undertones which seemed to depict the sullen garth as it awoke slowly from its night's rest.

* * * *

They say the most expressive instrument is the violin. There was an intense flowing passion in those high notes of Mr. Barker's violin as he played Chopin's best loved nocturne. The notes flowed on as if they would leave forever the beauty of night upon our souls. The low notes were as resonant almost as those of a 'cello. Mr. Barker then played a dainty minuet by Lulli; by the way he had one day in which to learn this piece and his rendition was very fine. We must hear more from Mr. Barker

* * * *

But expressive as the violin may be, there is a deep pathos in the human voice. We have all stirred at the mournful accents of a great actor, and I think there was this quality of expressiveness in the voice of Miss Forman as she sang the Lament of Rachmaninoff "As a soldier's wife I am left alone." And there was all the bitter woe of a forsaken one in her solo "O sleep why dost thou leave me?" Mrs. Tracy at the Musicale sang a dirge full of majestic tragedy. It was called "The Sea Gull" and told of that stern land where when fishermen do not return the women are bidden not to mourn for mourning, but increases the torment of their hearts.

* * * *

Hebrides makes one think of the home of the Vikings. There is a mystery about this Peer Gynt Suite, an eeriness impossible to express in words. I heard the Suite twice last night and I would if I could hear it every day of my life. There is the mystery of morning, that which Adam must have felt when he saw the light of a second day, mystery in the wierd rhythm of Anitoras Dance, in the swirl of shadowy figures dancing in the Hall of the Mountain King, and the mystery of death.

* * * *

That deep sense of freedom which we sometimes feel as we shake off the city's dust and stride over ploughed fields that is the feeling of "A soft day" sung by Freeman Waugh. He also delighted the group with two French songs "Bon Jour Suzon" and plaisirs d'amour. Mr. Waugh, I thought, displayed fine voice control.

* * * *

In happy mood was the folk song by Humperdinck. "I saw a little man," given by Miss Forman, and Mrs. Tracy rendered some charming German songs. There is the joy of work in her songs of dairy women far away in the Hebrides.

* * * *

Happily but with a divine happiness Bach composed his music. And in those opening bars of the accompaniment to "Wake, awake the night is flying" we find a happiness such as must have filled the angels on Christmas Eve. Surely there are few carols as exquisitely lovely as "Lo how a rose e'er blooming" by Praetorius. The men's chorus under Mrs. Williamson as they gave these carols showed a fine blending and balance in harmony.

* * * *

Dr. and Mrs. Gummer played a two piano number from one of Bachs concertos. I got keen delight in following the variation of the one theme which dominated this whole movement. To follow music attentively with an "ear" to its structure is the same as gazing at a beautiful flower. If you enumerate to yourself all its beautiful qualities you will have a clearer perception of its beauty.

THE CAMPUSCOPE

Posture

We have never been able to decide whether grandmother sat that way because of an inherent uprightness of character or because of tight corsets, but we have learned with the passing of years that her carriage was one of the factors which enabled her to disapprove of so many younger generations. Displacements and malformations of vital organs are unlikely to follow an upright carriage, and such affectations may be considered as predisposing factors to many diseases, especially diseases of a chronic character. Slouched shoulders inhibit the expansion and diminish the circulation in the apices of the lungs, where tuberculosis most often settles, a lax abdominal wall is a frequent forerunner of abdominal troubles, and if any part of chiropractice is to be believed, an improper placement of the vertebral column is the beginning of sin.

There is an age, usually from seven to ten in females and from six to twenty-nine in males, when exquisite comfort may be derived from a position in which the weight of the body is carried by the nape of the neck and the heels, placed on a chair-seat and a mantel-piece respectively, but this is a transitory phase. Sooner or later a stiffening of the joints or of the moral sense on both intervenes and the body is more decorously disposed, even in moments of relaxation, but the very inadequate modern ideas of decorum permit postures not calculated to maintain physical well-being, although it must be said that they leave little to be desired from an artistic point of view.

The habits of modern life affect many of us with regard to our carriage. It is one of the few good things to be said for a cigarette that one's back is frequently straightened by the attempt to keep the smoke out of one's eyes, while a pipe, otherwise an unmitigated blessing, may be heavy enough to drag one's neck out of line.

A glance around our classrooms reveals an astonishing variety of positions, most of them improper, but there is an excellent reason not far behind these inelegant poses. A very short acquaintance with hard and precisely horizontal benches brings the Freshman to the realization that a great truth is offered to the initiate by the ancient saying that 'constant dropping wears away stones.'

Many misunderstandings have grown out of postural defects. How is the ingenuous young lady to know that the boy sits on the back of his neck, not from boredom, but because he has gleaned from the works of intelligent advertisers the information that "if you save the surface you save all?" How is the young man to know, when she keeps her face turned away, whether he has halitosis or whether the girl suffers from the torticollus and overdevelopment of the pen arm that comes from the hearing of many lectures from a one-armed writing seat?

The maintenance of a flat back and a stiff upper lip is important both as a health measure and as a means of acquiring poise and presence. And anyone, with a little care, can manage it. An athletic development is not necessary for a proper carriage of the body. In fact, athletes, and particularly those who specialise, are less likely to walk and sit upprightly than persons of more sedentary habits. So strong is habit that the boxer may sleep with his head under his wing, and a wrestler must be prepared to suffer reverses which leave him for a week or so with one leg around his waist.

It is to be hoped that the "Grecian bend" will never come back, but grandmother was taught many things which might have been taught to her sons and daughters to their advantage, correct posture among them.

thinking Missions," which is the Laymen's Missionary Report of 1932. In criticizing the report, Mr. Faris stated that it deals with missionary work among the educated class only, which is from three to ten per cent. of the total population.

The report recommends that less emphasis be placed on Christian dogma than on human service. Christian missionaries should appreciate the values in Oriental religions. The significant fact is pointed out that graduates of Chinese Universities prefer to work in the cities. In China, as in Canada, students are educated in centres distant from their home communities, and tend to neglect work in rural districts. As a missionary, one is necessarily in contact with life in the country, and this fact requires a capacity to understand, love and sympathize with the people living there, and ability to co-operate with them.

It has been shown that ninety percent. of religious impulse results from personal contact. Formerly, attendance at religious classes in the schools was compulsory. In many cases this bred antagonism towards the church, and many men trained in mission schools have become anti-foreign leaders.

Mr. Faris ventured the opinion that some points had been overemphasized in the report, with a view to provoking more serious thought among church workers. "The opportunity is very great, especially in Oriental mission fields, for earnest men who are ready to serve as well as command," concluded the speaker.

Prof. N. Rogers

The week-end conference of the S.C.M. on the Campus was very fittingly brought to a close with an address by Professor N. Rogers on Christianity and International Relations.

"We live," said Professor Rogers "at the centre of a series of widening circles in which we try to find the fullness of our personalities." The progress of man has depended on the consciousness of these widening groups. The widest circle is that of international relations and it still lacks reality because of its recency; if this circle should be rent there is no aspect of our life that would not be jeopardized.

The lesson of the past year, during which war has broken out on two continents is that covenants and legal machinery are insufficient in themselves. We have found that the League possesses no magic power to prevent war, and responsibility has been returned to us. The League is weak or strong in proportion as we are weak or strong in our desire for peace.

"No nation," said Professor Rogers "has ever admitted that its cause was wrong after going to war. The plea that war is justified in self defence can no longer be recognized since there is no analogy between an individual fighting for self defence and a nation fighting for self defence. We must then take the step of outlawing all war."

"We can never hope to establish peace on a system of organized selfishness. We must teach a philosophy of peace that shall have duty as its first high purpose and we must have a single-minded desire to make peace the cornerstone of national policy."

Another feature of the programme will be a play—"It Pays to Advertise"—by students of Regiopolis.

Staff Of Brunswickian Resigns In Protest

Fredericton, Jan. 16 — Disagreement concerning policy was denied to be the cause of the resignation here today of the staff of the Brunswickan, weekly undergraduate publication of the University of New Brunswick. Although the action came as a surprise to the general public here, it was intimated that the occurrence had been gradually led up to by previous events.

Before resigning, the staff passed a motion asking for the resignations of the associate editors-in-chief, Fred Fenety and Frank Wetmore, and the appointment in their place of Carl Watson, sports editor. A report submitted to the Students' Council was adopted. Donald W. Swift was re-appointed business manager and re-organization of the editorial staff was proceeded with immediately.

It was explained tonight that last year Malcolm Ross was elected editor-in-chief. At the opening of the present college year, however, it was said, he found it impossible to spare the time required, and Fred Fenety and Frank Wetmore were appointed associate editors-in-chief, to carry on. Each was to share the duties, being in charge alternate weeks.

Lost Control, Claimed

This, however, was not done satisfactorily, it was charged by certain members of the staff, with the result that the two editors-in-chief were said to have lost control of the management, with much of the responsibility in this connection devolving on others. This was a "very mistaken idea," Fenety declared tonight, adding that neither he nor Wetmore had heard about the matter until afterward, and that then they were not informed of it by any authoritative source. He declined to comment further.

An unsuccessful attempt to effect a re-organization of the system of management of the Brunswickan was made at a recent meeting of the managing board, the informant continued. Opposition at that time was met from the editors-in-chief it was affirmed.

The matter was dealt with finally at an "indignation" staff meeting to-day, at which the associate editors-in-chief and the news editor, Campbell Creighton, appointed by the editor-in-chief, were not present. The Brunswickan has no definite constitution with the fact that today's meeting was not called by the editors-in-chief.

It was understood that among the new appointments would be that of Fred T. Brown, last year's sports editor, to that position again, and Bert Sutherland to the office of news editor.

MUSIC

Beethoven's Third Symphony, known as the "Eroica," opened the last meeting of the Music Club. The themes were briefly indicated by Mr. Macphail, who related two anecdotes, probably apocryphal. One was to the effect that on the first performance a Viennese in the audience stood up and shouted, "I'd give another kreutzer if the thing would stop!" It is also said that during the rehearsals a performer in the orchestra thought he detected an error in the score and nearly had his ears boxed by the irate composer. Next was played the rousing Prelude to the Third Act of Lohengrin, and then for comparison with the Funeral March in the "Eroica" a similar composition from the "Gotterdammerung" was heard. The last composition played was the Tannhauser Overture, which is chiefly based on the majestic Pilgrim's Chorus.

A lively discussion followed, in which the season's program was outlined. Once a week was deemed to be not too often to meet, at least until the pressure of work begins to be felt. All members who could play any instrument were urged to lay their talents before the Club; some, it was said, were already working up pieces which would soon be ready. It was unanimously resolved that "Henry" should be invited to perform.

AT THE CAPITOL

MARRY ME

with Renate Muller, George Robey, Harry Green

As a sort of successor to "Sunshine Susie" and "Jack's The Boy", the new British film at the Capitol is a disappointment. It has neither the hilarity, the snap, nor the pleasing individual performances which characterize its precursors. "Marry Me" has that over-attention to detail which sometimes produces artistry, but more often provokes restlessness. Technically, it is a little smoother than many British films. The décor is often effective, and the sound recording clear throughout.

"Marry Me" is a sort of cinematic musical comedy. One of the shots consists of three pyjama-clad males leaning gallantly out of a casement window in harmonic serenade to a lady who is so indifferent to this interruption of her sleep that she warbles the refrain in a musical comedy voice. For a talkie of this sort, I, for one demand plenty of good, sizzling, rhythmic dancing. Thus do song hits wing their way across the footlights, further impelled by subdued and satisfying orchestration. "Marry Me" suffers in that it contains no such dancing, no such orchestration.

Most of the comedy is entrusted to a shoulder-shrugging, gesticulating semitic wisecracker. Since the dramatis personae was not given it is impossible to reveal the gentleman's name.

Miss Muller is buttered with winsome coyness, and little is required of her save to juggle her eyeballs and lower her lids.

Preceding the feature picture is a short that deserves comment. It contains unusual shots of fairly frenzied outboard-motor racing, and is quite as exciting as a De Mille chariot race. C+.

AT THE TIVOLI

White Dombie—with Bela Lugosi.

Once again Hollywood attempts to grow premature gray hair on the heads of our rising younger generation and with the aid of Bela Lugosi, now nicknamed Dracula, and a pleasantly titled story, White Zombie or White Death, the producer, Holberin creates one of the most gruesome pictures ever filmed. One needs only an ear able to appreciate the beautiful sound effects brought about by the screams of vultures and men about to be killed and an imagination vivid enough to conceive of men being drugged, buried alive, and then recovered from their graves in the same condition in which they were buried, except that they are men without souls and one might term this a good film.

The story which takes place in Haiti, is of a sorcerer, (Lugosi) who has in his possession a drug which enables him to put his victim in a state of coma appearing so nearly like death that the person is pronounced dead and buried with the usual rites. After the victim is buried the sorcerer takes him out of the grave and from then on he is a mere accomplice without a soul ready to do the bidding of his master. Lugosi has cast this spell over many of his enemies when the hero and heroine of the story are first shown, and they are, on the night of their arrival in Haiti, treated to sight of dead men now returned, strutting after Lugosi in the manner of well-trained robots. Their frightened driver hurries them to their destination—the home of Monsieur Beaumont, a man greatly infatuated with the heroine, who has promised her fiancee a position with his firm as soon as they are married.

Events then move swiftly—Beaumont instead of helping the couple enlists the sorceror's aid and he places the girl under the spell. After seeing the girl he loves made into a human robot Beaumont decides there is more than beauty to a woman and pleads with Lugosi to restore her to her natural state. This sinister villian it seems has other views for he places Beaumont under his spell and takes the girl. But the hero enlists the aid of a kindly missionary, and they discover that the girl is not dead and after many battles, quite exciting, love wins out and the sorcerer and his souless henchmen are plunged to death.

Good entertainment for those addicted to detective stories, hut for others a C+.

'Russia' Subject Second Extension Series Talk

uinely desirous of friendly relations with the rest of the world. The former idea of world revolution has been dropped from Russian policy.

The new régime in Russia has in many ways improved the condition of the people. The "wolf-children" that roamed the streets after the revolution have been placed in institutions. And although religion, in the western conception of the word, has waned, there is not the persecution that is often reported. The former palaces of the Czar have been carefully preserved and are now art museums, and the spacious grounds have been transformed into children's playgrounds. "In fact," Mr. Clarke remarked, "if there can be said to be an aristocracy in Russia, the children are at the top."

The idea that culture and are have been destroyed in Russia is erroneous. It is significant that one of the greatest drives is for temperance. A petition containing a certain number of signatures enables the women of the community to take the law in their own hands and close up the saloons. Graphic posters encouraging this are placed in the streets.

The development of the great Dneiper power plant, a hundred miles from any civilization, illustrates the courageous planning of the Soviets. This plant will be the largest in the world when completed, and will be the centre of a vast manufacturing community.

The women, who take an active part in labour, are perfectly content with their jobs and everything is provided for their comfort. The five day-week with one day holiday for a fifth of the population allows the workers to spent every fifth day in recreation and enjoyment in the parks and museums.

On the whole, Mr. Clarke sees in the Russian planned economy something that will endure. He pointed out that for fifteen years now the Soviet Union has developed and is well on the way to the completion of the original planned economy. A graph which vividly depicted the upward climb of development in the coal industry since 1917, was given as representative of the general trend of industrial advance in Russia.

"Unless there is some great natural disturbance," says Mr. Clarke, "there seems to be no reason why the Soviet scheme will not succeed."

eleven years, during which period he passed the famous Red Square every day, in conversation with Mr. Clarke stated that not once during that time did he see anything in the Square that bore resemblance to a demonstration, although no less than seven violent demonstrations were recorded in foreign papers.

Mr. Clarke believes in the future of Russia, and is persuaded that the U.S.S.R. is established on a firm foundation.

Formal Ticket Sale Is Augury Of Success

Chuck O'Neil, the genial treasurer had an ear-to-ear grin when spoken to by the Journal. "We're going to surpass any thing yet attempted in the way of formal dances" was all he cared to say. Roy Sharpe, who is in charge of the food was out sampling the various dishes and could not be reached. Mel Halpenny has been doing some shopping lately and promises an innovation in the way of favours.

"Grit wins," said the auto racer as he poured sand into his rival's crankcase.

Bander Snatches

"How did you like the concert," said the Red Queen.

"That was not a concert," said Alice.

"Well, if it wasn't a concert," said the Red Queen, "What was it?"

"A marvellous exhibition of technical perfection," said Alice, "a faultless rendition of two very difficult pieces with very little consideration for the audience, flawless technique, perfect harmony, but not music.

"What do you mean?" said the Red Queen. "Don't you appreciate that it was the biggest musical uplift effort of the year?"

"Certainly," said Alice, "they told us themselves that it was intended to be uplifting and not entertaining, but it was not Music."

"And pray," said the Red Queen, "What does the ordinary freshette know about music?"

"I thought you would say that," said Alice. "You are always saying that I am silly and ignorant. I know that you will not pay any attention to what I say, but maybe you will believe the dictionary, and it says that "music is the science and art of the rhythmic combination of tones."

"Of course," said the Red Queen, "and did you ever hear such a marvellous combination of tones, such exquisite harmonies, such perfect—"

"Please," said Alice, "let me finish. If I understand the definition to have music you must have two things—harmony and rhythm and the dictionary says that rhythm is the regular succession of tone impulses. It is rhythm that makes your feet start keeping time. And the Hart House Quartet did not have rhythm at the concert they gave us. The first piece they played had no time to it. I will admit it had harmony, the tones were beautiful, but without time they were only a succession of pleasing sounds, not music."

"Now, now," said the Red Queen, "don't ever let anyone hear you talk like that. The piece you refer to was a symbolical one, it was supposed to depict the struggle between good and evil and in the last movement the triumph of good."

"Bah," aid Alice, "so do northern lights and sun-spots, and the lowing of cattle, and the bleating of sheep depict the same thing just as intelligently. Dr. Tovey who was professor of music in Edinburgh University, said that when musicians wandered into the so-called realm of the symbolic it was all nonsense. Why only the other day I read that the battle between Tweedledum and Tweedledee was symbolical of the same struggle. Even the crow was held to represent—"

"There you go again," said the Red Queen, "nobody wants to hear any more of your adventures."

"I'm not talking about my adventures," said Alice, "I am talking about the Hart House Quartet. What those fellows need is a good conductor. Just imagine what Romanelli could do with them. Why with their skill and him for a conductor they would be simply marvellous."

"I don't think they want to be marvellous," said the Red Queen. "At least not what you mean by marvellous,—and anyway the audience applauded them. Didn't they?"

"Sure," said Alice, "but do you know why?"

"Because they liked it," said the Red Queen.

"Not by any manner of means," said Alice. "Because they thought they ought to. People who applaud something they are supposed to understand, but don't, are like the man who always ate the wrong end of his asparagus and maintained that it was because he liked it, because the first time he had eaten it he got the wrong end by mistake, and all his life was ashamed to admit that he did not know."

"Didn't I see you clapping," said the Red Queen.

"Certainly I clapped," said Alice, "I thought if we clapped long enough they might play an encore that we knew and could enjoy. Why if they had played something with a tune to it,—say a medley of popular airs—people would have applauded them till you would have thought the house was coming down and gone home talking to themselves."

"Perhaps you are right," said the Red Queen, "though I certainly hate to admit it, but do you know you have not mentioned the only thing that I thought was wrong with the program,—not playing the National Anthem."

"I was not going to mention that," said Alice. "Because every time I do any talking around here it seems to get into the Journal. And the Journal goes all over the world, and it would never do for the natives in the Fiji Islands to hear that in Her Majesty's own university they did not close a program with "God Save the King." They might jump to the wrong conclusion and perhaps think there had been a falling out in the Royal family, so don't let us say anything about it."

Tricolor Battlers Win Ten Victories In Ottawa

against a long and well experienced exponent. Ennis almost scored a knockout victory in the final round. He crowded Carroll around the ring and brought the fans to their feet with a stinging right to the head. Ennis won the last round but this was not enough to win the bout. This boy certainly looks the favorite to win the title at his weight for Queen's at the Inter-collegiate Assault this year and without a doubt the best boy seen under Queen's colors in many years at his weight.

"Chuck" Woolgar, southpaw middleweight finished on the losers end against E. Stafford. Woolgar got off to a slow start and made the battle exceedingly close in the final round with a rousing finish but the winner had a slight margin and was awarded the bout. The likeable "Chuck" is just rounding into shape and will be seen in the winning role in the near future.

Cliff Campbell, another newcomer and a most promising light weight speared H. Brown of the Madison club with a jolting left hand jab and according to the judges he won the bout, but for some unknown reason the referee called Brown the winner, Campbell took two of the three rounds by good margins, staggered his opponent repeatedly with right rights and appeared a good winner; however, the referee's decision was not protested probably because Queen's had practically won the Assault before this bout was run off. Campbell showed unusual class and will be the man to beat in the Intercollegiate championships at his weight, he is lightning fast and has a thorough knowledge of the game.

Wrestling

Queen's grapplers were outstanding and made a very favourable impression on the citizens of Ottawa not only by their ability, but by their good sportmanship, their work was a credit to their coach, Mr. Bews, and also to Henry Hosking who functioned in dual capacity handling the team of wrestlers and competing himself against a stellar opponent successfully, the flashy Queen's lightheavyweight star, thrice Intercollegiate champion showed the Ottawa fans a remarkable turn of speed in securing two falls over his most able opponent. Hoskings made a big hit with the audience and looked every part the champion he is.

158 lb.—Jimmy Campbell, Tricolor lightweight star grappled his way to a notable win over Dennison of Ottawa. Jimmy came close to gaining falls on 3 occasions, but Lady Luck was not with him, and he had to be content with a points victory, a well earned one too. "Watch Jimmy this year, he appears to be headed for lightweight honours in intercollegiate championships."

158 lb.—"Gordie" McMahon, crack middleweight wrestler of Queen's showed his opponent Scottie McKay of Ottawa more than a few tricks of the ancient art of wrestling, tossed the Ottawa boy twice in quick succession, scoring over an artist who conceded victory for the first time in his career.

"HUTCH" HUTCHISON

145 lb.—Hutchinson, Queen's intercollegiate winner in the welterweight class showed brilliant form and scored a one fall victory over V. Chapman of Ottawa. Hutchison showed a world of class and was never in danger.

The boxers were handled in admirable fashion by Jack Jarvis and the general opinion is that the genial coach will develop his usual array of boxing stars again this year. Unfortunately Mr. Bews was unable to make the trip, but was well represented by Henry Hos-ing.

SPORTS SLANTS

The Senior "B's" are not cheering about the exhibition they put up. And neither are they crying. Playing their first game together, they made mistakes as was natural, but they will improve.

* * * * * * *

They did not get any help from the referees in the last period, and the parade to the penalty box turned a peppy game into a one sided affair.

* * * * * * *

Opposing forwards will not sail in on Daniels so often if the defence uses their anatomy a bit. It was lacking in Friday's game.

* * * * * * *

The basketball team requires more practice games. They serve to put a squad in shape quicker than endless practices.

* * * * * * *

Johnny Wing was used on Friday, and he showed plenty of pep, even following his strenuous game on Wednesday.

Senior Team Lost Game To Kingston

Friday the 13th was an unlucky date for Queen's Seniors because they lost their opening league game to Kingston's speedy sextette, 7 to 2.

At no time did the Tricolor look to have a chance to win against the fast clever aggregation that boasted the Limestone colors. Off to a slow start, they were three goals down in the first ten minutes and while they got one of these back before the period ended, they lost it during the second period and were eclipsed completely in the final frame.

The game was interesting if one sided, and there are many who believe that the Tricolor will improve immensely with an additional game under their shirts. Wing, Carr and Patterson had seen action, but the rest of the Tricolor were playing their first game of the year and many mistakes they made will be remedied.

The score at the end of the first period was 3 to 1 for Kingston, and the Tricolor showed signs of perking up. One of these goals Kingston should not have had for Queen's in their anxiety to break fast, sent four men up the ice leaving one lonely defence man to stop a three man Kingston rush.

The second period promised to go scoreless, until Frontenacs netted one in the last minute of play. Queen's missed two excellent chances to score in this period, but then Kingston also had some hard luck. The period ended 4 to 1 for Kingston.

The last stanza showed some wierd hockey, with plenty of rough stuff on the programme. The officials should have curbed some of this earlier, but allowed the players to rough it up, and then began to bear down in the final period, sending off men for minor offenses, at one time having five holding down penalty pews. Queen's had to hold the fort with three men and Kingston lost no time in scoring a goal that looked to be six feet offside. Daniels showed his worth here by staging a spectacular display of goal tending that brought plandits from the fans. He gave a neat exhibition all through the piece.

Kostnik scored Queen's first goal on a solo rush in the opening period, and Jim Arthurs got the second on a pass from Johnny Wing late in the last frame.

For Queen's, Daniels, Storms, Arthurs and Kostuik stood out, while Teague, Smith, Carr and Wing toiled mightily. The front line was slower than Kingston's and the defense were inclined to check with their sticks instead of their bodies.

Play was cautious at first and Frontenacs took the lead when Wilson pushed the puck past Daniels in a scramble around the nets. Queen's changed lines and so did Wing for Queen's, and Muchmore, Kingston. Smith, Capstick and Amey and Nicholson for Kingston, with Roberts subbing Murray on the defence.

The game livened up somewhat and Kostnik and Storms gave the Kingston goalie a few anxious moments. Kingston sending back their first line at the bell. On the first play Queen's got 4 men caught in the Kingston defence zone and a 3 man combination beat Kostuick with Bellringer notching the second goal for Kingston. Both teams again shifted lines and things looked up when Murray bodied Wilson and let Patterson through, but Gousell saved. Play shifted back and forth, then the teams changed lines again. Soon after this Thurlby scored on a nice pass from Bellringer, making it 3-0 in favor of the City. Queen's paired this lead down when Kostuick went through all alone to beat Gousell. This ended the first period, 3-1.

Second Period

Teams started the same and play was slow for the first five minutes. Both teams shifted lines with Bentley going to defence for Roberts. Bentley drew the first penalty of the game for hoisting Storms.

Queen's put Wing, Patterson and Arthurs on in an effort to pull even. Nothing happened, however, and with Bentley back the game settled down again. Gousell making a wonderful save when Patterson was right through. The pace livened up somewhat when both teams sent in substitutions. Roberts sent off for tripping Storms. Bentley on to strengthen Kingston defence. Queen's forced the play and Kostnick was right through, but missed an open net. Patterson and Bentley had a slight argument which they settled in the penalty box, Queen's first penalty. Nothing more of interest till both teams changed lines and on a nice play Nicholson laid a shot on Danny's pads, the rebound getting loose and Muehmore slammed it home to make it 4 for Kingston. Period ending 4-1.

Third Period

Things opened with a rush and Amey was right through, but Danny saved. Kingston came right back, however, and Roberts drew in the defence and layed a perfect pass to Bellringer who walked in for Kingston's fifth goal. Kingston sent on Muchmore, Nicholson, Amey and Bentley, Queen's moving Kostuick to left wing in place of Capstick and Arthurs for Teague. Queen's now had four forwards up. Wing missed on a nice drive and the game continued fast with Kingston sending on their other line. Bellringer came down the left boards and beat Danny with a hard shot for the sixth Kingston goal. Wing and Thurlby were penalized and a minute later Teague was sent to the box by Dougall for bodying Murray. Kostuick was Dougall's next victim for no apparent reason, and with a two-man advantage Kingston banged in another one. Then Dougall considering he had done enough damage sent Muchmore off for hooking Teague, Wing and Thurlby came back and evened things up somewhat, and Danny was called on to make a remarkable stop on a rush by Bentley. Kostuick came on and Queen's with a one man advantage forced the play. Nothing happened and when Muchmore came back to even things up Patterson came on for Storms. Roberts was penalized and Queen's were rewarded when Arthurs banged in Queen's second goal. Queen's were still forcing the play when the bell went. Game ending 7-2.

Queen's—Goal, Daniels; defence, Storms, Kostuik; centre, Arthur; wings, Carr and Patterson; subs., Smith, Capstick, Wing, Teague.

Kingston—Goal, Goswell; defence, Murray, Bentley; centre, Bellringer; wings, Thurlby, Wilson; subs., Muchmore, Amey, Nicholson, Roberts.

Husband: "Yes, dearie. I did forget and it's quite natural that I should. There really isn't anything about you to remind me that you are a day older than you were a year ago."

Tom: Have another drink, ol' fellow? What'll you have Angus: Mon, mon! Ye've been payin' all night. Let's match for this one.

"They say this brand of liquor is popular because it's so strong."

"Yep, everybody's falling for it."

SOUTH SEA ADVENTURE
"Faraway" by J. B. Priestly (Macmillan and Co.)

Disappointment awaits the person, who delighted by "The Good Companions" and by "Angel Pavement", expects to find in Mr. Priestly's newest, the same remarkable wealth of characterization. "Faraway" has little of the appeal, the amazing power and depth possessed by its two popular predecessors.

We would like to think that this present book is not intended as a "tour de force" but rather that it is merely an interlude, a mental holiday for the author—merely a not too-ambitious entertainment until another splendid creation shall arrive. We have every faith in Mr. Priestly's skill and wisdom and therefore must remain undecided until his next is forthcoming as to the question—is this rather fantastic tale, the fruit of a sudden desire for novelty or does it spring from a state of literary exhaustion?

The locale of this current offering is strangely remote from those of his past ones, taking place as it does in the South Seas, chiefly on and around the island of Tahiti. In brief, the story is concerned with an enterprise undertaken by four persons, to rediscover Faraway, a small island in the Southern Pacific, because it is supposed to contain pitchblende or radium ore. The participants are—William Dursleigh, a maltster in a small English town; Mr. Ramsbottom, a wealthy, middle-aged manufacturer; a retired Naval Commander; and an attractive American girl, P. T. Riley, or Terry as she is called. With Tahiti as their base, they make several attempts to reach Faraway and when finally successful, an overwhelming surprise is theirs.

The characters offer little variation or contrast. They are never quite real, never wholly creditable. Certainly they do not step out of the pages to solicit our sympathies and understanding as did such memorable people as Jess Oakroyd, Miss Trant and Mr. Smeeth.

Bored with his existence in parochial Buntingham, William Dursleigh, forty years old and unmarried, is still boyish and desires romance, glamour and adventure. Although his wishes are realized, save when he first falls in love with Terry, his is never a vital portrayal. We feel that he is wooden and rather colourless. Ramsbottom with all his jollity and bluster, with all his hallmarks of the prosperous middle class, suffers the same fate. He is never quite genuine or complete in our conception. The Commander is better perhaps, a slimly-drawn representation of the mild, honourable seaman, proud and uncomplaining in the penury of his enforced retirement. He is likeable, yes, but seems ever unmotivated from within. Terry, sparkling and smartly American, fails somehow to be especially interesting due to the inconsistency of her moods. A slight character, Mrs. Jackson alone, all too briefly impresses us.

"Faraway" despite its shortcomings is enjoyable and even intriguing. As a travel book; it has high merit, the descriptions of Tahiti being particularly good. If a modern treasure-hunt and an excursion into strange, exotic places, fascinate you, we can unhesitatingly recommend that you read this book.

—J. H. B.

Sports Views

The opening Senior "B" game served to demonstrate that Queen's should have had a practice game or two before beginning the league games.

Only a small crowd turned out for the battle, the violin and cello contest in Grant Hall attracting a great many. At that the majority of the latter would have understood the hockey game a great deal better.

On Wednesday Queen's tackle R.M.C. in the latter's home game and the cellar position will be battled for. The Cadets always add color to their games and a better game than last Friday's is looked for.

On Friday the Juniors again come into the picture with a second game with Frontefacs. It was either team's game on their last meeting and the decision might easily be reversed in the second game.

The Juniors go to Brockville for an exhibition game on Wednesday which will put them on edge for Friday's game.

The basketball squad enjoyed a real workout against the Cadets on Saturday afternoon. Howie Carter was out and showed that he has lost none of his cunning. Quite a crowd of interested fans were on hand for the game.

Get an earful or an eyeful of this, clipped from the columns of a prominent Western Ontario daily.

"Milton Burt is coaching the Midland hockey teams this winter and rumour has it that he will not return to Queen's next fall. Just what the reason is has not been given out, but it is believed the players themselves have something to do with it. They are reported to have disagreed with the coach on several matters although Burt always had his way. It seems funny that a team comprised of the poorest players Queen's has boasted in many years should be so uppity in their tastes and demands."

There are many funny statements in the above and the writer shows that he is as familiar with Queen's football squad and its doings as he is of the price of mothballs in Mongolia.

It seems strange that many of the players who had worked wholeheartedly with previous coaches, should have suddenly decided they would buck Burt, without cause. None of the players on the senior team has achieved a reputation of being hard to get along with, so why put all the blame on the players?

And surely Carter, Storms, Carr, Kenndy, Ralph, Davoud, Hamlin and others cannot be classed as poor players even compared with championship teams. True Queen's had some indifferent players but she also had some mighty fine ones.

QUEEN'S FENCING CLUB

Freshmen, eliminations will take place on Wednesday and Friday 18th and 20th at 5 o'clock sharp. Eliminations will be held in the form of two pools. Science and Arts consisting of five men each.

Senior Basketballers Defeat R.M.C. Team

In an exhibition game, Saturday afternoon, the Senior Basketball squad, led by Captain Donny Bews, defeated the R.M.C. entry into the new Senior "B" Intercollegiate Basketball League by the score of 22-14. Sterling defensive work by Bews and McLaughlin prevented the determined thrusts of the R. M. C. team. The latter's rushes were also a feature and netted the Queen's team 5 points. The forward line of Rooke, Hallet and Newman pulled off some pretty combination work, but there is still plenty of room for improvement and it is hoped that by the time the first scheduled games rolls around that many of the raw edges will have been polished off.

Except for spasmodic rushes by R.M.C. which included some pretty dribbling by Shirreff, Queen's had the edge throughout. Rooke of Queen's was the other high scorer on the team also netting five points. McMahon, Eby, Brown and Carter also played well.

The teams:

Queen's—Rooke, F. (5); Hallet, F. (4); Newman, C.; McLaughlin, G. (5); Bews, G. (2); Alternates, McMahon, (2); Eby, (2); Brown, (2) and Carter.

R. M. C. — Sterme, F. (2); Shireff, F. (6); Oaks, C. (2); Robertson, G. (2); Christian, G.; Alternates, McDonald (2); Sisson, T. E. and Sisson H. W.

Kingston, Ont.,

The Editor,
Queen's Journal.

Dear Sir:

This is the first time that I have ever had the urge to break into print—and I believe that my reason for doing so at this time is one worthy of the attention of all students and particularly the Athletic Board of Control.

When entering the University every year we are asked to contribute a sum of $11, for athletics—a large percentage of which goes towards the maintainance of our new Gymnasium. We are all exceedingly proud of this Gym, but, Mr. Editor, in my opinion it has become a mausoleum to Athletics instead of a Temple where ALL may benefit physically from the excellent facilities which it affords.

Arts students, not having lectures in the afternoons, are free to make liberal use of it, but Science and Medical students are usually occupied with class work until 5 p.m. in the afternoon, and as the gym is closed to them after 6 p.m. one can readily see that an injustice is being practiced against them.

This situation should not be allowed to continue. Science and Medical students are paying for the Gym as well as Arts men. Why cannot the same privileges be arranged for the former as for the latter.

DENNIS.

Honor Not Dead

The honor system has been extended at the University of North Carolina. Under the new plan, each classroom group elects a committee which has full jurisdiction over breaches of honor, suspension of students for violation of the code, and reporting of students to the council.

Birds Have Family Fights Like Humans

We reprint the following from the Montreal Gazette.

Human beings are not the only ones who have matrimonial difficulties, according to Mr. R. Owen Merriman, of Queen's University, who addressed the Province of Quebec Society for the Protection of Birds, at its monthly meeting held last week in the Mechanics' Institute. Birds have their family squabbles, their weddings and divorces, and even cases of bigamy are not unusual. Although there is no law in the bird kingdom to check these feathered Brigham Youngs, the ladies themselves will stand for none of it. Any breach of "love, honor and obey" on the part of Mr. Bird, and his wife promptly shakes her wings and literally "gives him the air."

Cases such as these may sound far-fetched to the man on the street, but Mr. Merriman assured his audience that close study of bird life had revealed such incidents to be true. On one bird sanctuary, said Mr. Merriman, a male mouse wren had mated with a female of that species, and together they had built a comfortable nest. Eggs were hatched by the female and things went along splendidly, until one day the male bird met another lady who quickly captured his heart. He installed her in a suitable home and convinced himself that his double life would never be detected. The original wife, however, was wise to his pranks. Without warning she flew off and left him with half a dozen infant birds to tend and feed. The husband, who perhaps regretted his unfaithfulness, rose gallantly to the occasion and brought up those six infants almost as well as any female could have done.

The study of bird-life, said Mr. Merriman, is one of the most fascinating hobbies known to man. For centuries the daily life of birds has been watched and studied, but only since the inauguration of the present system of bird-banding, have there been any concrete facts gathered about the habits of individual feathered folk. Normal adult birds are caught in traps which in no way injure them. A numbered band is attached to the leg of each subject and then the birds are released. By re-capturing the birds at a future date, the bander can tell much about their lives. In addition, reports are sent in to the original bander by other persons who have caught the birds in their traps. A bird may be banded during the summer in Kingston. In December may come the report from South Carolina that this same bird has been trapped there, and its number written down. In this way the time, distance and duration of the migration flight can be ascertained.

Banding System

Many facts concerning bird-life are discovered through banding. Information on breeding, migration, feeding and winter grounds, nests, migration routes and numerous other interesting habits has been gathered by this present system. The total number of banded birds registered at the Department of Agriculture, Washington, since 1920 is approximately 1,123,000, and the number of return reports on these birds figures at some 63,000.

Mr. Merriman, who is one of the leading bird-banders in Canada, showed numerous lantern slides on the process of trapping and banding feathered folk. During the twelve months ending last June, Mr. Merriman and his sister handed 2,810 birds, making a special study of Chimney Swifts, which flock in large numbers to his home in Kingston. He spoke of their habits and explained his method of trapping them.

W. S. Hart, the chairman of the society, introduced Mr. Merriman.

Dr. H. Tracy Addresses Arts '35 Year Meeting

Dr. Tracy was the guest-speaker at a meeting of Arts '35 last Friday.

The subject of Dr. Tracy's speech was "Music and its relation to the other arts." In the course of his remarks Dr. Tracy drew an instinctive parallel between the various arts under the main heading of form, theme and symbolism, and illustrated the resemblances and contrasts that can be traced.

At the close of his address Dr. Tracy was warmly applauded.

The meeting afterwards spent a few minutes discussing matters of public and private business, and then adjourned.

To Continue Course In Musical Training

Feature Of Summer School Very Popular

The course in musical training and appreciation inaugurated at the Summer School session last year will again form a part of the Queen's curriculum, this coming summer.

An announcement to this effect was made yesterday. A small grant from the Carnegie Corporation has been made to the University for the furtherance of the meritorious work so ably undertaken by Edoardo Petri, director of the choral school, Metropolitan Company, of New York.

It will be remembered that Mr. Petri had a very large class at the Summer School session last year. His efforts were highly successful and one of the best choral concerts ever staged in Kingston was presented last August by the Summer School students under his direction. The student choral group was reinforced for the occasion by forty members of the Metropolitan Opera Choral School.

It is hoped to undertake the training of several church choirs in the vicinity of Kingston at the next session of the Summer School. Thus choirs from Belleville, Napanee, Gananoque, Brockville and Kingston could benefit by Mr. Petri's coaching and direction.

Selections On Piano Feature Of Musicale

The program of the Ban Righ Musicale held last Sunday evening was of an exceptionally high order. Eight-hand piano selections were a unique feature of the evening, while the admirable vocal numbers by Mrs. Tracy and the men's chorus and a two-piano selection of four hands by Professor and Mrs. Gummer were enthusiastically received by the audience.

The first number was given by the men's chorus. "Wake, Awake" from Bach's "Sleepers, Wake!" Their second selection was "Lo How a Rose E'er Blooming" by Michael Praetorius (1571-1621). "Selbstgeständnis", "Gesang Weylas." and "Auftrag" were the first group of songs rendered by Mrs. Tracy who also sang three of Margaret Kennedy Fraser's Hebridean lyrics "Sea-gulls of the Land-under-Waves," "A Milking Croon" and "A Churning Lilt." Professor and Mrs. Gummer played the first movement of Bach's "Concerto" for two pianos. Miss Phyllis Knight, Mrs. Tracy, Miss Lois Baker and Miss Phyllis Smith gave the eight-hand piano number which consisted of the four movements of the Peer Gynt Suite No. 1.

Last Sunday evening's entertainment added one more to the many successes attained by the Ban Righ Musicales and Miss Elsie Williamson and Mrs. Williamson who arranged the program are to be congratulated.

Playing an exhibition basketball game, Queen's defeated K.C.I., finishing with a score of 25-20. Both teams went at it tooth and nail, and there was plenty of action. Do. Kenny did most of the scoring for Queen's and Marian Walker for K.C.I.

Line-ups:

Queen's: Doreen Kenny (Capt.), Ruth Fishleigh, Nora McGinnis, Evelyn Rickard, Joe Tett, Aileen Mason, Isa Galbraith, Kay Wayling.

K.C.I.—Marion Walker (Capt.), Betty Patterson, Vyola Brooks, Helen Cottee, Dorothy Peters, Jean Wraight, Irene Curtis (sub.), Dina Murray (sub.).

Miss Murphy hopes to have the Intercollegiate team chosen this week and is planning another game against K.C.I. tonight at 7 p.m. in the Queen's gymnasium.

In a hockey game yesterday afternoon, Levana '35 defeated Levana '36, finishing with a score of 4-1. Jean Cameron hood-winked the Freshette goalie by placing three goals. Marg. Chambers, though borrowed from another year, scored the remaining count. The Freshettes made their one and only tally when three of them practically swamped the '35 goalie and rendered her helpless. The Freshettes showed up remarkably well, however, for it was their first appearance as a team. The line-up was:

'35—Margaret McGregor, Marg. Chambers, Jean Cameron, Florena Cramp, Marion Paul and Lola Billings.

'36—Elva Fawcett, Hetty Bolin, Edith Grant, Eileen Mason, Stella Fletcher, Marjorie Young, Molly McDuffee, Helen Johnson and Dot Clemens (borrowed from '34).

Referee: Roy Dougall.

The final Interyear Hockey game will be played at one o'clock this afternoon between Levana '34 and '35. Levana expects a good turnout, for the teams are well-matched and spectators are promised an exciting display of hockey.

Mammals Of Ontario Are Interesting Study

The collecting and preservation of skins and skulls of the small mammals for museum purposes, as a hobby that will well repay the student of biology, was the theme of an interesting address by Mr. G. C. Toner to members of the Natural History Club.

The small mammals of Ontario, Rodenha and Insecturoua, are a most interesting group for study. Very little work has been done on the systematics of the various groups and still less on the ecology. Fluctuations of animal populations is a problem that still remains unsolved though much work has been done. The field workers see this problem mainly in the number of trap hours necessary to take any of the smaller animals. That is, by trap hours is meant the number of hours times the number of traps set to take one animal. This varies with the fluctuations of the annual population as can be seen and is a method of determining such variation. The rodentia can be divided into several families, such as the squirrels, the field mice, the lemming mice, etc. Each ecological district has its own fauna, and one or more representatives of each family may be found in these. To illustrate, the field mouse is found throughout Southern Ontario, except in the Carolinean faunal area where its place is taken by a southern species. North of the French River in the Hudsonian area the yellow cheeked vole is the common species. The different conditions under which the animal lives is shown by a change in species.

In trapping the shrews are the prize that most collectors desire. Weeks of trapping may only give one or two species, though they are probably more numerous than the trap hours would show. The bats are known only from specimens that are accidently taken. No method, except shooting or hunting for roosts, has been devised to take these animals. As they are mainly nocturnal they are very hard to shoot, and every bat taken should be preserved and submitted for identification to the experts.

In conclusion, Mr. Toner showed a number of specimens that he had collected and the methods of keeping records used by the museums.

Comedy To Be Presented In Auditorium To-night

"March Hares" which is being produced at the Technical Auditorium to-night is a comedy in three acts by Harry Wagstaffe Gribble who wrote the screen play "A Bill of Divorcement."

It is a comedy about temperamental people and, although the title might suggest it, has nothing to do with "Alice In Wonderland."

The play is produced by Dorothea Goodfellow of Superior, Wisconsin, and the featured parts are played by Martha Johnson, Mrs. Roland Browne and Arthur Sutherland of Queen's Dramatic Guild and Mrs. Bruce Jemmett and Dr. E. J. Ballis of the Dramatic Group. Minor roles are played by Sarah Revelle, Dorothy Rigney, Fulton Best and Dr. Percy Lowe. Special student tickets 25 cents.

Winning Of Intercollegiate Tennis Championship Outstanding Success Of Year In Levana Athletic Circles

Minor Places Taken By Basketball And Hockey Enthusiasts

In reviewing the year's activity in Levana sporting circles, the foremost achievement has been the winning of the Intercollegiate Tennis Championship. On this occasion Levana's star players, Doreen Kenny, Ruth Fishleigh, Carmel Milne, and Liliana Demetrova brought the much sought after trophy to Queen's for the first time in many years. In previous tournaments single championships had been captured, but never had Levana so distinguished herself as in these matches when her team defeated the best of the players from sister universities, and conferred the happy title of Intercollegiate Champions upon her representatives. Special mention should go to Doreen Kenny, who is one of our all-round athletes, having taken part in almost all of Levana sports. Doreen was the mainstay of the Queen's team with her steady playing in both singles and doubles matches which enabled her to carry off the Singles Title and to share the Doubles Title with Ruth Fishleigh, a Freshette who is confidently expected to play the same part in Levana sports.

Intercollegiate Hockey has a large following among Levana, many of whom strive for positions on the team. Although this league is not officially an intercollegiate fixture, since there are but two teams, Varsity and Queen's, it provides good possibilities of development. The hockey cup had been in the possession of Varsity until 1931, when Queen's held it for a year, but expectation runs high for the return of the handsome trophy to Ban Righ Hall.

Basketball has been a feature of winter sports since the first Inter-

Memorial Book Has Not Yet Been Received

Miss Jo Tett, President of the Levana Debating Club, in a recent interview with a Journal reporter, stated that the Memorial Book which should come to Queen's by virtue of the double victory of the debating team, has not been sent, nor has any official intimation been received. The valuable book which contains the names of the winners of Intercollegiate debates, inscribed in gold is at present in the possession of McGill University and it is hoped that immediate action may result. The success of the Levana representatives, Misses Bessye Sheffield, Kathleen Morrison, Dorothy Wilkins and Ada Adams would be thus recognized.

Vincent Massey To Speak Here Monday

"Canada And Outside World," Lecture Topic

"Canada and the Outside World" will form the subject of the extension lecture to be given by the Hon. Vincent Massey next Monday afternoon. The address, which is timed to begin at 5 p.m., will be broadcast from C.F.R.C.

The visit of the former Canadian Minister to Washington is expected to tax the seating capacity of Convocation Hall to the utmost, and the University Lectures Committee with this in view have made all necessary arrangements.

The career of the Hon. Vincent Massey has been one of great distinction in the field of public service. A graduate of the University of Toronto and Balliol College, Oxford, Mr. Massey returned to Toronto to join the staff of the University as lecturer in Modern History. In 1918-19 he was first Secretary and then Director of the Government Repatriations Committee. He later became President of the Massey-Harris Co., Toronto, and Director of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and of the Mutual Life Assurance Co. of Canada. He resigned from these positions on his appointment to the Dominion Cabinet, in which he was Minister without Portfolio in 1925. The following year he attended the Imperial Conference in London with the Canadian Delegation.

In 1926 Mr. Massey was appointed Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary for Canada to the United States, and he filled this newly created office with great distinction and notable success until 1930.

Mr. Massey is a Trustee of the National Gallery of Canada, a Governor of the University of Toronto and Upper Canada College, and Chairman of the Massey Foundation.

Co-Education at Queen's

by Mary M. Chown

So accustomed have we grown to seeing women students about the campus, and to their taking a prominent part in almost every activity of University life, that it is difficult to realize that scarcely more than half a century ago the first special classes for women were formed at Queen's. And Queen's was pioneering in this matter as she has in many another. In 1870 a few intrepid females were permitted to attend classes in English, French or History — which strictly cultural subjects were deemed most suitable for this advance guard of Canadian feminists.

A few years later, after much discussion, and in the face of bitter opposition from without, strangely, as well as from within the University, women students were admitted to courses leading to a degree in Arts. The Medical Faculty followed suit, and in 1880 opened its doors to women. Two years later a separate Women's Medical College was formed and affiliated with the University. For a number of reasons this little college was obliged to close after ten years—but not before it had graduated a number of splendid doctors.

Though since 1894 Arts has been the only Faculty open to her, the late Georgian female is not as restricted in her choice of subject as was her Victorian predecessor. The woman graduate of 1933 helps herself to a research scholarship in biology; she earns a degree in commerce; she specializes in psychology; and she takes honors and medals in classics and science and mathematics.

During the years from 1914 to 1919 Queen's carried on, as one of her professors was heard to remark—and he wasn't at all pleased at the idea — almost as a Ladies' College. It was during that time that women athletes had their opportunity. For years the Senate had frowned upon intercollegiate sports for women, and the inter-year games alone, provided very little interest and enthusiasm. Since 1923 Women's Intercollegiate Basketball, Hockey and Tennis have been played. Intercollegiate Debating teams compete annually, and the gold "Q" vainly longed-for by previous generations is awarded to women who make these teams.

The opening of Ban Righ Hall and the addition of three annexes: the steadily increasing registration of women students: the recently inaugurated system of exchanges with European Universities: the research and travelling scholarships for which women students may compete, and the variety of occupations open to women graduates, suggest that Queen's has come a long way in the matter of co-education since the parlous pioneer days of 1870.

Belief In Philosophic Inevitability Of Social Reconstruction Outlined By Spencer Clark

Quoting Herbert Spenser's definition of evolution, Spenser Clark in a recent address to a group of students, outlined his belief in the Philosophic Inevitability of Social Reconstruction.

Maintaining that the solar, the biological and the social evolutions all carried out the principle embodied in the classic definition of a change from an "indefinite, incoherent, homogeneity to a definite coherent heterogeneity," Mr. Clark declared that the present confusion in the commercial world, the present anarchial state of affairs, could only be remedied basically by Social control. Private attempts to foster this aim have resulted only in injury to society through private profiteering. Although a human cratic society is feared by conservatives as a result of any attempt to reconstruct the economic system, Mr. Clark pointed to the Russian experiment, where mass standardization of the pre-revolutionary era has changed to a greater differentiation of Russian life in all classes of society. In this case the process of evolution has meant both greater integration and greater differentiation of the parts within, and that there is no reason why this principle can not be applied to a general social reconstruction.

Mr. Clark raised the question of the origin of peace and harmony in life and queried whether this condition arose out of simplicity or out of well-regulated complexity. Deciding that the latter was the means of efficiency in business life, and that co-operative industries are leading the way to social reconstruction, Mr. Clark assured his audience that as the Russian experiment had benefited the country, so also the inevitable economic revolution of this age would be the greatest development and the salvation of the present economic situation.

Levana Basketeers Beat K. C. I. Easily

Another in the series of exhibition basketball games was played with K.C.I. recently. The playing of the Queen's team showed decided improvement. There was better passing and the girls seemed very enthusiastic and they all appeared to be of equal value to the team.

During the first period Queen's kept the ball continually, giving K.C.I. no chance to score. In the second period K.C.I. picked up but at the finish Queen's were leading with a score of 46-12.

Line-up:

Queen's—Do Kenny, Bud Yuill, Nora McGinnis, Ruth Fishleigh, Evelyn Richard, Kay Wayling, Isa Galbraith, Jo Tett, Hilda Rice, Dorothy Naphtali, Aileen Mason.

K.C.I.—Helen Cottee, Dorothy Mooney, Betty Patterson, Jean Wraight, Dorothy Peters, Louise Procter, Irene Curtis (sub), Dina Murray (sub).

Charming Hospitality Prevails As Levana Society Entertain At Annual Senior At Home In Ban Righ Hall

Dining And Common Rooms Distinctively Decorated For Event

With the charming atmosphere of a house dance, Ban Righ Hall was en fete Wednesday evening for members and friends of Levana on the occasion of the Senior Levana At-Home. The guests were received by Mrs. W. Hamilton Fyfe, Dean and Mrs. Matheson, Miss Hilda Laird President of the Levana Society.

The happy throng of dancers cavorted in the softly shaded Common Room with its rose-colored atmosphere, the walls banked with delicate azaleas and carnations, showing to perfection against the green background of the large palms and ferns. Small rose-colored lights in their modernistic black and white shades cast a subtle glow over gaily-colored frocks, swirling to the rhythmic melody of Warmington's Orchestra ensconced in the deep bay window.

A startlingly different atmosphere was evident in the dining room, where mural decorations, consisting of life-like animal cut-outs transformed the room into an interesting art gallery, where portraits of our friends, Mickey and Minnie Monse could be seen. The numerous windows each held a lamp of welcome, radiating happiness to the gay dancers as Hopkirk's Orchestra played its program of popular dance tunes.

The Reception Room and the Board Room were converted into comfortable sitting-out places and were deservedly popular between dances. The buffet table, placed at the far end of the dining room, was presided over by Mrs. Laird, who was assisted by Miss May Macdonnell and Miss Mary Chown. The delightful supper, consisting of dainty sandwiches, ice cream, cake and coffee, was

Future Of Canadian Dollar Is Discussed

Commerce Club Hears Noted Business Man

"The return to parity will probably not be accomplished within the next ten years," said Courtlandt Elliot of A. E. Ames & Co., at the Commerce Club's first luncheon of 1933. Past experience shows that from the low point in 1920 parity was not reached until 1926. Recovery from the present position will be slower due to the probable falling off of the tourist trade and the gold export which were the large items in Canada's favor. The legalization of wine and beer in U.S. will probably remove the prime motive for American tourists to visit Canada while at present the export of gold is prohibited except by special license.

While on the gold standard only economic forces act upon the exchange rates. Canada's position has been strongest in the fall when the Canadian Banks convert their surplus reserves in New York into Canadian funds to finance the grain trade. Borrowings are made under the terms of the Finance Act to enable wheat to be purchased from the farmers for sale in the foreign market, and this leads to an increase in deposits and in discounts. This process is reflected in the Bank statement, which therefore provides a good guide to the trend and volume of foreign business transactions. The spring months are usually the weakest when the surplus reserves are again placed on call in New York.

Thursday's luncheon set a record in attendance, about seventy-seven meals being served. The fee has been reduced to fifty cents and those who have not yet paid are urged to get in touch with Chas. O'Neill.

Another meeting of the Commerce Club will be held shortly.

Science '34 Defeats Levana 'Hockeyists

Showing steady improvement the Levana hockey team held the Science '34 aggregation to a 6-3 victory. Dot Clemens and Jean Nelson, playing on the defence, proved to be the outstanding performers for the co-eds.

The teams were:

Levana — Margaret McGregor, goalie; J. Nelson, Dot. Clemens, defence; Marg. Chambers, centre; J. Stewart, J. Cameron, wings; Ruby Cordy, sub.

Science '34 — Mitchell, goalie; DeMocko, Bews, defence; Smith, Collins, wings; Wilson, Hanson, Southern, Whitmore, subs.

The Final Interyear game, between Levana '34 and '35, takes place at one o'clock this afternoon. Due to consistent practice and the supervision of the coach, Roy Dougall, the girls are in first class condition and the game promises to be well worth seeing.

To Levana

As this week is marked by the Levana At-Homes, we wish to dedicate this issue to the Levana Society, although we have discontinued the policy of publishing yearly issues dedicated to the Queen's faculties. Through the splendid work of the Levana Editor, Miss Helen Kennedy, this issue contains several articles of special interest to the co-eds.

Levana To The Fore

It has sometimes been alleged that the presence of women in a university lowers the general standard of work: interpreting this somewhat ambiguous statement in the sense that girls' examination marks are on the whole lower than mens', and that their intelligence is consequently less evident, we do not, of course, presume to contradict it. But this seems an appropriate moment to point out that in this university the feminine element has been known to set examples in other activities which might be followed with advantage by the masculine element. Leaving athletic successes to another page, it may here be noted that Levana recently won an interfollegiate debating championship; this is surely a creditable achievement in a generation of inarticulate youth, and more particularly in a university where male debaters remain speechless.

The Levana Society has an eye for tradition too. Seized with a premonition that student government at Queen's was becoming an anomaly, the Society carried through some reforms and rearrangements which have had the desired result of producing enthusiastic attendance at meetings, and a general interest in following local affairs of state. We have arrived at the conclusion that a Society which lacks compactness and some sort of "esprit de corps" must necessarily be ineffectual: when every stray member of Levana has been educated to this theory, it confidently expects to become the most powerful influence on the campus. For these are only beginnings: there seems no reason why Levana should not go from strength to strength until its members are at the head of every organization at Queen's .... And if there appears anything incongruous in this vision, we venture to suggest that the other elements of the University should speedily look to their laurels.

The Reference Shelves

To the student who has any interest in his courses the Reference Shelves are—or rather have been—a constant solace. Here one found books of whose existence one had been unaware, books dealing with one's subjects in perhaps a new aspect, or throwing new light upon it. And if the book wanted was being used by someone else, there was always a choice of other, newly-discovered volumes. But now—unless the title and the author of a book are on the tip of the tongue, the Reference library ceases to be of any value to the student.

Books which the professor has not happened to mention in lectures may spend their days under layers of dust, because no eye may explore the shelves. No one may scan the backs of the books in search of varied knowledge. The library assistant, moreover, must waste his or her time telling us that the book we want is out, when in the good old days we merely glanced at the shelf and noted its absence for ourselves.

May we hope that this arrangement is a temporary one? Or must we urge the Librarian to remember what Charles Lamb said: "Shut not thy heart, or thy library."

WITH OTHER EDITORS

Unjustified Materialism

The American system of higher education, despite the pronouncements of critics such as Dr. Flexner, is fundamentally sound, since it is an expression of the American temperament. Such at least is the thesis presented by Ben Belitt, undergraduate of the University of Virginia, in an article entitled "Machine Age Education" appearing in the current issue of the New Outlook.

Mr. Belitt's philosophy is apparently based on principles of complete democracy and materialistic pragmatism. He asserts, in the first place, that any institution is "primarily the servant of the many, and many must be given preference over the exceptional or the few"; hence any university reform must conform to the opinion of the majority of its students. Secondly, the writer contends that an institution is sound insofar as it reflects the character of the majority of the people it serves. The American mind, in his estimation, is "concerned less with theory than with application, less with causes . . . and values than with results." The average undergraduate, he feels, has no use for cultural pursuits, but, because of the exigencies of modern life, is interested solely in deriving from college what will insure immediate and tangible results: "his lodestar is bread and butter."

Since the university should reflect this attitude and cater to it, the fact that American colleges tend to give practical training rather than a more theoretical, cultural education is not, as many critics claim, a basis for condemnation but rather a justification and pragmatic validation. In short, Mr. Belitt's theory is that "so long as the American heart is after the ideal of the full purse, there shall his mind be also, and there, in fine, his university shall, and should follow."

This defense of practical training as against cultural education, which Mr. Belitt attempts to make persuasive by his apparent bravado in cleaving to what he considers realities no matter how bitter and selfish, is almost too obviously false and shallow to merit remark. The trend of thought is, however, typical of a certain element of undergraduates; and for that reason is worthy of appraisal.

In the first place, it is not at all self-evident that the university policy should be directed by the majority of its students, for the democratic dogma that the majority is always right is hardly defensible. It is at least a questionable matter of fact, in the second place, that the American temperament is such that the majority of students have no interests in any studies except those which will directly aid them to fill their pocketbooks. And third, and most important, is the fact that even if one hypothetically admits the writer's premises, admits that the American ideal is pure materialistic selfishness, and that the American university does reflect this spirit in its character, there is not the slightest justification for assuming, as Mr. Belitt does, that it should reflect such a spirit. In fine, the author is arguing that because something is so therefore it should be so, which is utterly false. And so his whole theory fails in its purpose of justifying mass-production of practical training in colleges as what ought to constitute an education.

—The Princetonian.

Laments of a Public Speaker

Curricular complaining among college students usually can be classed under two headings. One exists as a sometimes justified "gripe" at some course which is an educational misfit, which gives little or nothing to the student in return for effort expended; and the other is a confirmed habitual complaining about a course which the student knows quite well that he needs more than anything else in the curricula.

There may be found an appreciable number of each at Purdue, but there is one which falls in the latter catagory that strikes us as having received far more than its share of complaint. It is the course in public speaking, through which all engineers must pass before they receive their diplomas.

It has been the writer's experience on innumerable occasions to listen to some student's long tale of woe concerning the utter lack of justice in compelling a free, bona fide student to take a course in public speaking. Usually these sorrowful stories have been unraveled on the night before the luckless victims were scheduled to give a speech before the class.

Surely not one of these confirmed "gripers" of public speaking, if he stopped for a moment to consider the significance of such training in his chosen profession, could justify his complaining on any reasonable basis. The ability to convincingly present a case to an audience, large or small, is a precious tool in the hands of a capable engineer, and it often proves the difference between success and failure to college graduate, whether he be a Tau Bete from the upper tenth or a plodder of the lower academic region. From one angle, the ability to speak well is even more important to the engineer than it is to the politician, for the engineer is usually given a limited number of minutes to say something, while the politician is granted unlimited hours to say nothing.

Just why such pseudo-lamenting should exist is a puzzle. Probably the best explanation would be to lay the blame upon that patient blame-receiver, human nature, and epigramize that man hates the worst what he needs the most.

—Purdue Exponent.

Finality in Surgery

"The craft of surgery has in these days almost reached the end of its progress along the lines which so far it has followed. The full fruits of Lister's work have now been garnered. Infection may be confidently denied entrance to any fresh wound in which a focus of infection is not opened. Operations are consequently performed by the great masters with a success that leaves little hope of betterment. The gravest, most extensive, most delicate operations are carried out upon every organ in the body, including those only recently made accessible with a success that no one, not Lister himself would have believed possible. New methods of treatment may no doubt appear in our further development. But so long as cutting operations of the kind now practiced have to be applied for relief or cure of disease, it is hardly possible that their success can be improved, except by change in the quality of material submitted, that is, by preliminary preparation of the patient increasing his powers of resistance to attack. If this be true, and I hold it to be indisputable, what further progress is possible along what lines? The answer is that although in the last fifty years since Lister's work was accomplished, the methods of surgery have become so finely perfected, the human material submitted for the surgeon's work has changed very little. Can we, by following Lister's example, do anything to improve that material, or to forestall or prevent disease?"

The above excerpt and the following one are from "The advance of medicine by The Right Honourable Lord Moynihan. The Romanes Lecture delivered in the Sheldonian Theatre, Oxford, June 1, 1932.

"Surgery is more than a Science, more than an Art, it is a sacrament. For the surgeon, therefore, no training can he too arduous, no discipline too stern; none of us may measure devotion to our cause in dealing with menacing realities, the surgeon must possess courage and humility; must feel confident in his strength, sincere and tender in its timely application; must work with an exactitude that is piety. For us an operation is an incident in the day's work; for our patient it may be, no doubt often is, the sternest, most dreaded of all trials. For mysteries of life and death surround it, and it must be faced alone. Those who submit to operation are confronted, it may he after weary days of suffering, with the gravest issues, and far more often than many of us suppose they pass into the valley of the shadow of death and, in stark dismay, wonder with Beatrice in her aching solitude and panic what will come to pass—

"If there should be
No God, no heaven, no earth in the void world,
The wide, gray, lampless, deep, unpeopled world.

To give courage to those who need it, to restore for life to those who have abandoned it, with our skill to heal disease or check its course—this is our great privilege. Ours are not the mild concerns of ordinary life. We who, like the happy warrior, are 'doomer to go in company with pain and fear and bloodshed' have a higher mission than other men."

While so great an authority as Lord Moynihan, whose Romanes Lecture is quoted above, may not be lightly contradicted, it is hard for anyone at the beginning of a life in the practice of medicine or surgery to believe that the science of surgery has reached the limits of possible progress. It has been said at so many times and of so many branches of science, that the top has been reached, and the statement has so often been contradicted by substantial advances, that its repetition by workers in any field is rather surprising.

Since the scienee had its beginning, surgery has been, so far, a purely palliative measure. The introduction of aseptic methods extended the field, but added little to the purpose. Reparative surgery has even now scarcely begun. The process of grafting has been given a small start; epithelial tissues, and bone are transferred, but the world still awaits the man who will replace glands and organs successfully. The stir made by the first attempts at gland substitution has almost subsided. The experiments were not quite successful. But success has seldom attended first essays.

And contemporary surgery is almost wholly a naked eye procedure for a gross incision and approximation of tissue leaves gross evidences behind. Minute structures are microscopically dissected now. May not the surgeon of the future work under at least the lower powers of magnification?

The present surgical incision heals by the same processes, and at the same rate as an accidental wound of similar nature, kept free from infection. We have heard of the electric knife, read in the journals accounts of its efficacy, but its improvement to perfection, and its adoption by the bulk of the profession lie in the future. This and similar tools are, of course, developments in physics, but as medical physics advances, so surgery advances.

There are laurels to be worn and progress to be made by the rising generation, in surgery as in other lines.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

Kingston, Ont.,
January 16th, 1933.

The Editor,
"Campuscope".

Dear Ye Ed.,

Some weeks ago, a correspondent called your attention to the Fraternity racket in the Medical Faculty. I have awaited with interest bordering on eagerness the reply of some loyal brother of Nertz Dammit Nertz, but nary a reply. Whether this arises from a plain lack of guts, or inherent modesty and a desire for self-effacement, who can say?

However, Ed., it is but in the field of advertising that the racket is so subdued. From a comparitively innocent organization in 1930 that was spanked and sent to bed by the A.M.S., it has grown in wisdom and stature, and apparently, in favour with God and man, since with cheerful insolence, it thumbs its nose at the constitution that its members are sworn to obey, and by a combination of infiltration and absorption has gotten a strangle hold on the business and ruling of at least one year in the Faculty.

Individually, there are some good men in the Frat., football players, basketball players, representatives of and on most of the Societies on the Campus, and such. But as a gang, it's a racket. We can't all be triple threat men, but that is not a reason why we should get the greasy end of the stick in everything, even the dispensary allotment.

But there is yet time. A bit of organization, a gentle nudge at the dormant, but doubtless efficient A.M.S., and Aesculapian Courts, and the career of Nertz Dammit Nertz will end even at it began, another stormy chapter in the history of Queen's will close, and the hissed passwords and mystic handclasps will be forgotten as quickly as they were initiated.

Yours, etc.,
CICERO.

It Really Happened

A couple of frosh women were overheard getting acquainted Thursday morning in a Johnson hall class.

"Do you know your anatomy?" lisped the blondie.

"I'm a what?" was the innocent reply.

Ah, me, clevah, these freshmen.

—Washington Daily V.

"The most shocking wet orgy since pre-war days," was the description given of a recent Illinois University smoker. When the outraged dean of men investigated this report, he learned that the "wetness" was merely water, liberally distributed over the unsuspecting students when a waterpipe in the ceiling of their party room burst.—McGill Daily.

Officials at the University of Denver are aiding fraternities this fall by preventing the graduation of any seniors who are in debt to their chapters. Members who owe money to fraternities also are prohibited from transferring to some other university.

CALL HER SAVAGE
with
Clara Bow, Thelma Todd, Monroe Owsley, Gilbert Roland

Producers of motion pictures often release pictures starring great actresses or actors but which are handicapped by weak plots on the theory that the glammour and acting of the star will make the picture saleable. "Call Her Savage" is such a picture and it is hampered more by our dear friends, the censors, who have seen fit to "cut" the film in a most generous manner.

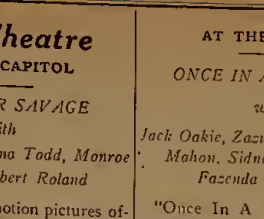
In spite of all the defects in the plot this picture is rendered quite entertaining by the excellent performance of Clara Bow, who acts the role of Nasa, the half-breed girl, so well that her much heralded "comeback" to the screen is a brilliant success. Miss Bow plays her role of the fiery half-breed girl whose dramatic life carries her from a western ranch to the urban east, from riches to poverty and again to riches so naturally and spiritedly that the reviewer doubts that anyone in Hollywood could equal her interpretation of this type of character. Because of the star this picture is rated a B.

AT THE TIVOLI

ONCE IN A LIFETIME
with
Jack Oakie, Zazu Pitts, Aline MacMahon, Sidney Fox, Louise Fazenda and others

"Once In A Lifetime," in circulation for some months now, has been a little slow arriving here. This department commends it heartily as one of the most delightful satires to have reached the screen.

Originally a stage crack at Hollywood, it has been transferred to the films with a certain degree of fidelity. While some of the acid has been removed, the talkie version of "Once In A Lifetime" remains a deliberate and amusing joke at the expense of Hollywood. Its naiveté, its almost pathetically bourgeois conviction of being infallible, its blatancy, its spurious tinsel and cheap glitter, its blundering stupidity—all these are handled with obvious enjoyment. But remember, dear public, it is you too, who are being laughed at. The well-known "Croix de bologney" is likewise pinned on your chest.



And Hollywood has bought the rights to laugh at itself because you will buy out the box-office to see "Once In A Lifetime." A—.

By R.M.

I have two dog-eared, antidiluvian little volumes of Charles Lamb's "Essays of Elia", third edition (1808). Despite their archaic style, these essays have a distinct appeal—one that has endeared them to the English speaking peoples for a century.

The quality of mind evinced in these essays is a rare whimsicality; tangential ideas irradiate the dark passages displaying an Ariel-like disregard for cold facts. Lamb wrote, "I am a bundle of prejudices—made up of likings and dislikings—the veriest thrall to sympathies, apathies, antipathies." That is, as it may be. He still holds our sympathies for the trials, undergone with true fortitude; for his all pervading love of humanity. Life was an odd experience to him. Around every street corner might lurk an adventure.

Mr. Bernbaum has divided "The Essays of Elia" into four general classes: personal reminiscences, character sketches, literary criticisms and hints on the arts of living. But the very nature of Lamb's talent forbids any rigid classification; these general types are intermingled. The Essays on "Blakesmoor", "South Sea House", "Artificial Comedy of the Last Century", and "Popular Fallacies" are representative of his work. The first series appeared in the "London Magazine" up to 1823, while The Last Essays of Elia were printed in 1833.

The first paragraph of "The Superannuated Man" is interesting, because of the intimate light in throws on Lamb's workaday life. "If peradventure, Reader, it has been thy lot to waste the golden years of thy life—thy shining youth in the irksome confinement of an office; to have thy prison days prolonged through middle age down to decrepitude and silver hours, without hope of release or respite; to have lived to forget that there are such things as holidays, or to remember them, but as the prerogatives of childhood; then and then only, will you be able to appreciate my deliverance." He was superannuated at two-thirds of his salary, when only fifty, by the East India Company.

"Christ's Hospital Five and Thirty Years Ago has a double significance; it is autobiographical, and it picturizes the famous school with which Lamb, Coleridge (and Dr. W. H. Fyfe) were connected, as it was over a hundred years ago. According to Lamb the bill of fare was not very palatable: "Our Monday's milk porritch, blue and tasteless, and the pease soup of Saturday, coarse and choking; were enriched for him with a slice of "extraordinary bread and butter," from the hot loaf of the Temple." He speaks of the tyranny of the monitors: "I have been called out of my bed, and waked for the purpose, in the coldest winter nights—and this not once—but night after night—in my shirt, to receive the discipline of a leathern thong, with eleven other sufferers, because it pleased my callow overseer, when there has been any talking heard after we were gone to bed, to make the six last beds in the dormitory, where the youngest children of us slept, answerable for any offence they neither dared to commit, nor had the power to hinder." No wonder Lamb's tender feelings were evoked at such a recollection. Times certainly have changed.

Honours for the success of "March Hares", the comedy put on by the Kingston Drama Group, go to the three members of the Queen's Dramatic Guild — Art. Sutherland, Lee Williams Browne, and Martha Johnson.

* * * *

Sutherland was easily the outstanding performer. The Queen's Dramatic Guild should get wise to the fact that this boy can act, and give him better parts in their productions.

* * * *

"March Hares" was well produced and acted, but the sooner Amateur Dramatic Groups realize that this sort of stuff is not worthy of their effort, the greater will be their ultimate success.

The movies can handle this light material much better than amateur groups.

served to the guests by their charming hostesses.

The dancing continued until after one-thirty in the flower decked Common Room and in the picturesquely decorated dining room, accompanied by a blare of colored caps and noise makers which vied with the orchestras.

The capable committee responsible for the attractive setting of the dance included Doreen Kenny (convener), Peggy Boyd, Norah McGinnis, Margaret Newton and Elizabeth Cameron. The Committee was assisted by Les Williams, who planned the lighting effects, and Don Neville who created the mural decorations in the dining room.

This was the first of the At-Homes; the second dance will be held to-night in the same setting, and will begin at eight-thirty.

B.W. F. Team Meets Ottawa Saturday

Queen's Senior Hockeyists Score Decisive Win Over R.M.C. Squad

Queen's and R.M.C., deadly foes on many a field of sport met on the ice in a regular league fixture on Wednesday evening and Queen's emerged victors by a 5 to 1 score.

It was more than just another battle. Both teams had suffered losses in their first start, and the loser of the second game would occupy the cellar, while the winner had a chance to get somewhere.

With the memory of a rather mediocre performance in their initial game against Kingston, the Tricolor Seniors went about their work in a different manner, and clicked so well on their plays that an impressive margin was rolled up against their opponents.

It must not be thought, however, that the score, while rather one-sided, indicated a runaway victory for Queen's. The Cadets, as always fought back with everything they had and led by Pop Irvin, they tried manfully to stem the tide of goals.

Coach Elmer, gave his team a going over following the first game and their play was greatly improved. Johnny Wing was restored to the Juniors, while Murphy and Elliot were given prominent parts in the evening's chores.

All the boys went well and unselfishly passed the rubber at every opportunity. As a result, much better combination was dished up for the fair sized turnout of fans. And they witnessed an exciting battle if the hockey was not of the highest class. Arthurs led in the goal getting with two, while Kostuik, Smith and Storms got one each. The scores at the end of the periods were, 1 to 0, 3 to 1 and 5 to 1.

R.M.C. showed a team of fighters, but they were not in the same class. Pop Irven on the defence was the ignition of the Cadet attack and he had rather hard luck in his shots, though he laid them dead on Danny's pads, and you cannot score goals on Danny that way. The Cadets showed up much better at checking and every man worked a hook check to more or less advantage. This served to hold Queen's in the first two periods, but in the latter piece the Tricolor forwards proved to be speedier and trickier.

FIRST PERIOD

The hockey was not of the best and while it was exciting neither goal was in any great danger, because of the close checking along the front lines.

Queen's started with Daniels in goal, Storms and Teague on the defence, Arthurs at centre, Carr at left wing and Patterson at right wing.

Play was desultory for the first few minutes with both teams taking turns at rushing and getting nowhere.

Pop Irven almost caught Danny off guard with a long life from away beyond centre ice and from then on, Danny was only fooled once, but that wasn't until the second period.

It took Queen's ten minutes to get their first and it came as a result of a rush by Kostuik and a short bullet like drive to the corner that gave White no chance.

That pepped up the game with the Cadets driving hard to equalize. The spares were called in often and Coach Elmer used Jack Murphy at centre, Sock Smith at right wing and Junior Elliot at left wing. Kostuik went on in place of Teague. This second line worked very well together and had rather hard luck on occasion. The period ended Queen's 1, R.M.C. 0.

The piece was only a few seconds old when Peck tested Danny with a hard drive, and the fight was on. Teague spilled Blanchard all over 5 to 1 over the Cadets. That was much better, and showed what the Senior squad had in its makeup.

* * * * * *

While the Cadets are not as fast as the Frontenacs, nor as tricky, they gave Queen's a hard fight, and the Tricolor were full value for their win.

* * * * * *

The Juniors have their knitting to do to-night, and it won't be easy. Frontenacs will be on the bit and looking for a win.

* * * * * *

With hockey, B.W. & F., basketball and swimming on the card, the fans will not have to stay in nights, wondering which text book to tackle.

* * * * * *

Friday evening will bring a fresh corp of hoos from the Kingston fans when Queen's skate out. There ought to be a flock of students along to hand them a Queen's yell in reply.

* * * * * *

Queen's Seniors play their only game away from the Jock Harty Arena on Monday when the entire squad in charge of Bill Glass will bus it to Gananoque and try conclusions with the natives of that burg.

Figures are usually all wet. Gan. took a decision from the Cadets in overtime, the score being 4 to 3 and the Cadets figured they were unlucky to lose. But Kingston only beat Gan. 3 to 0, while they walloped the Tricolor 7 to 2. On paper Queen's should find Gan. easy picking but with their home chorus to urge them on, the Thousand Islanders will try their durndest to stay in the running.

Queen's are a greatly improved team, and they should go even better in their next start on Monday. With another win in the duffle bag, they will be all set for a new deal with Frontenacs.

* * * * * *

On Tuesday the Interfaculty Fish will get their chance to show what can be done with a little water and few torsos. This Interfaculty Swimming show will be held in the new Gym on Tuesday evening and is expected to draw a large crowd of fans.

There is some excellent talent in the ranks and it would be worth an evening to see how the boys go through their stuff.

* * * * * *

Saturday evening will find the B. W. & F. squad in another series of fights and rassels with Ottawa Y. as the big attraction.

The boys showed the Capitol folks plenty to talk about in their invasion last week-end, and many fans will take advantage of this opportunity to see the stars that Jimmy Bews and Jack Jarvis have lined up for Intercollegiate honors.

* * * * * *

Grant Baker, that dynamic 112 pounder has been seen around the gym of late. It is hoped that he can be persuaded to represent Queen's in the coming Intercollegiate Assault. He would bolster the Queen's chances considerably.

* * * * * *

The Interfaculty Assault promises to present the latest style in swatting and throwing. Come and get your technique improved.

MERVE PEEVER

Who will be seen in action in the B.W.F. Meet to-morrow night.

B. W. F. Contenders In Steady Training

The boxing and wrestling gym is a regular hive of activity these days, in preparation for the big Assault on Saturday night. And are we going to win. "Just ask Jack Jarvis"! and if you don't believe him ask Jimmy Bews, veteran physical instructor, and developer of wrestling champions. Left hooks, right jabs, flying mares, headlocks, and other vernacular of the ring, are all we hear these days, and once again black eyes, and sprained backs are the fashion on the campus, if you don't believe the writer, ask Abe Zvonkin, husky rugby star and wrestler.

Bud Gorman, the trainer, has sent out the clarion call for help, and now we find an able assistant in the person of Fergy O'Connor . . ."no standing in line for a rubdown now"! efficiency, ability and speed compose the vocabulary of the training quarters. Now that we have dealt with coaches and trainers, and found them capable, let's have a few words about fighters.

We don't think we can find a better competitor than the redoubtable Merve Peever to commence this part of the story, the sparkling custodian of the Intercollegiate welterweight crown, for the past three years, will endeavonr to elucidate to everyone why he is the most respected welterweight in the dominion of Canada, and why he is enlogized by sport writers in almost every province. Peever will take on the Ottawa City Champion, Eddie Crippen.

Another boy and an outstanding Queen's boxer is Jack Ewen. This boxing luminary is improving in leaps and bounds, and he is a really spectacular artist when the sound of the bell dies away for the first round. Watch him go on Saturday night.

Among the good boys, we are forced by his ability to recognize Cliff Campbell. Inasmuch as he lost the decision in Ottawa, he will be ont to prove the judges were right and the referee wrong.

Space does not permit us to enlarge on the rest of the boxers individually, suffice to say, they are all good boys, and of high calibre, and the remainder of the program will be filled from the following: "Chuck" Woolgar, Art McKillip, R. Binch, R. Code, J. McDonald and McGill, the new bantam weight prospect. Jimmy Peters, young light heavyweight will make his debut against an Ottawa boy. This should be a real good battle.

Unfortunately "Frosty" Ennis, who put up such a good bout in Ottawa, will be unable to compete at Queen's this year. 'Frosty' broke his left hand in the first round of his fight in Ottawa, and although he finished the fight, and gave a most excellent account of himself, he will not be available for the remainder of the season.

And now for the wrestlers, Jimmy Bews has a galaxy of stars . . . he always has . . .

Henry Hoskings, stellar light-heavyweight, will again take on the heavyweight champion of the Capitol City. In Ottawa, Henry took two falls out of the champion, and is a good bet to repeat. Those who possibly think that wrestling is a slow game should come and see this bout and be convinced that there is speed, ability and action in wrestling.

No wrestling meet would be complete without the clever "Gordie" McMahon. His bout in Ottawa was outstanding and if "Gordie" wrestles the same man on Saturday night, "look out for fire works"!

"Hutch" Hutchison, Jimmy Campbell and A. Burford, will again take the men they wrestled in Ottawa. Each one of these men are worthy exponents of the mat game, and their reputations will be enhanced by another win in the coming Assault.

Mr. Bews has other talented grapplers, such as Carlyle, Conquergood, Mel Schwartz, et al. and from these the balance of the wrestling card will be drawn. It will be a good evening's sport. Students tickets will be accepted, and to the general public the Athletic Board of Control is offering popular prices of 25 cents and 50 cents, in an attempt to meet the pocketbooks of all.

The following words constitute the speech of a Communist student in the University in Toronto, delivered to a group of Christian students. Whether you agree with it or not is of little importance. But the most inveterate foe of Communism must recognize the terrific dynamic and passion which is in it. We suggest only that its vigour, its urgency, its sincerity, be compared with the few speeches which are heard in student groups on the average Canadian Campus.

Fellow-students,

Listening yesterday to Margaret Beer's account of her impressions at the World Conference in Holland and to her pitiless but justified condemnation of our indifference and laissez-faire attitude towards the solution of our only important international problem: The present and future happiness of mankind, I suddenly felt myself transferred to another world, to another congregation of young men and women students and graduates, doctors, engineers, teachers just as you are here. Hundreds of them representing thousands,—

Moscow—the heart of the Soviet Union.

The All-union conference of the Russian Communistic Youth Association. January, 1931.

How do they poison the student mind in Russia? What are they doing there, what are they living for?

Listen to some of the last words at the close of the conference.

"We are dreaming and working to realize our dreams letting these dreams guide us through life and justify our daily work. We do not dream of personal happiness and satisfaction; our dreams are more stupendous and daring,—

Our goal is a classless society, where everybody gives according to his ability, where everybody gets according to his needs. Our dream is the conquest of culture for all and the destruction of the gigantic ocean of human suffering. (direct translation) Our task is to remove the causes and not the pain alone. Our dream is active, urging, it calls us to sacrifice, to fight, to fight for our beliefs and convictions.

Our dream we bring into life. Socialism is conquering, the army of it's defenders grows and for each of us, whose best years, perhaps were burned out in the monotony of the daily tasks and sacrifice, the highest reward will be in the ultimate achievement of the goal. If not to-day then to-morrow.

We have a goal, we have a belief, we have the will-power to sacrifice. The destruction of the ocean of human suffering. The words have received wings. Tomorrow the returning members of the conference will carry these words in their hearts to the remotest parts of the Union, the press will repeat them in hundreds of different languages of the constituent republics, the powerful broadcasting stations have already sent out the message.

What do we care for the salvation of our souls, for the eternal punishment and hell and paradise, how can we listen to the frightened, restraining prayers of our mothers even if it hurts bitterly to cause them pain when this sea is threatening to swallow all the treasures we have, all the love we possess.

We are guided by eternal instincts, by internal moral code, which is as old as mankind, which is common to all of us and which all of us at least recognize if not follow.

Margaret Beer said, "Russian Youth was not represented at the conference. Unfortunately people stick to their denominations. The words Christian, God, Religion scare us. They have been misused and abused so much and were and still are the indirect cause of much unhappiness and anguish.

We have no time to define what God is and what he looks like, and whether he was listening or not to five foolish Christian nations in war with each other asking in their inexcusable arrogance for his help and victory over their unchristian enemies. We have no time to discuss with you the all important theological question whether Christ was the Son of God or the son of man. We do not care.

We do not care, but the dream of human happiness, the love and eternal pity which Christ sensed in His heart, put to words, suffered and died for is also our dream.

The historical task of this and the coming generations is to substitute human love and genuine service to mankind for the brutal, anarchistic, unchristian foundation of our present social order, the private profit. When the goal is the same, when our hearts are fired with the same emotions, why not make an attempt to common understanding, why not look under the surface, why demand the same finishing and color if the cores are made of the same metal.

To dream is very easy,—beautiful, daring dreams. . . . To realize your dreams is a task of a lifetime. Inspiration alone will not carry you very far. Knowledge is difficult to obtain. But love, overpowering love and everlasting pity and consideration of others, the beginning and the end of all inspiratioon and understanding, faith and conviction, will give you wings and strength, purpose and justification of our otherwise rather dull and worthless existance.

Signed, Boris Heimburger.

Queen's Senior "B" Beat R.M.C. In Hard Battle

Queen's had a big margin of play in this period and were outlucked on many occasions through over anxiousness. Time and again they were through the defence, but passed erratically. However they helped themselves to a couple of goals to wind up the evening.

Patterson and Arthur who combined very well all evening teamed up for the fourth goal, Paddy taking a nice pass from Jim to notch the counter.

Irvin went off for scrounging Patterson, and on the same play Patterson took a rest for scrounging Irvin, and that's that. Peck was the next to get a penalty and Patterson got his second after being on the ice only a few minutes.

The boys still liked the humping game and everybody went down a few times to be sociable. Patterson went wicked and with a few minutes to go, was requested to occupy a place in the confession chamber for the third time.

Arthurs and Bill Carr staged a duet on the last goal, Arthurs taking a perfect pass from Bill to lay it away behind White. And that ended the scoring. Final, Queen's 5, Cadets 1.

Sit Down

"Just where did the car hit you" asked the judge.

Plans for a jaunt to McGill this year are under discussion, and the abduction of the treasured Bronze Baby—so well cared for by Varsity—is contemplated by the 1933 team.

Formal Committee Plans Unique Affair

The latest converts to the prevailing ideas of socialism are the members of the Arts Formal Committee. In the words of Professor Eric Havelock, who lectured here last week, the committeemen "make no bones about confessing that they are against the old system, against production for profit, and against patching." That describes exactly the ideas of the Formal workmen. We quote further from the socialist doctrine: "Equalization of opportunities for the disinherited is one of the principles of socialism, and all socialist principles are so fundamental that they must be fulfilled in fact, even at the expense of revolution." Similarly, those attending the Arts At Home one week from to-day will find a revolutionary change in music and equal opportunities for all alike to have a highly enjoyable evening.

The only place where private effort will flourish will be in the sitting-out places. As usual these will be in the balcony and in the B.W.F. room. The Journal is informed that Jack Jarvis has before him an offer to teach the sitters-out some brand new holds. It is understood, however, that several experts in wrestling of the parlour kind will be present on the night of January 27th, and it will not be surprising to find that Coach Jarvis will learn a thing or two.

By a curious process of which most of the students at Queen's are ignorant, the success of the Ban Righ formals automatically insure big turnouts to the following formal dance. If the tradition of former years holds true, then the supersalesmen on the Arts Committee should canvass all of those who received bids for the Levana celebrations. The Journal is entitled to a royalty on each ticket sold if this suggestion is adopted.

Programs of a most artistic design will be mailed out together with the tickets about the first of next week. Invitations to the ladies are being sent out on Tuesday or Wednesday. The purchasers of tickets who do not visit the Arts clubroom regularly may leave their receipts in a ballot box which will be left on the bottom floor of Douglas Library on Monday.

A carload of Egyptian urns has just been received and as long as the customs inspectors do not interfere, will decorate the floor of the dance hall. The source of this shipment could not be definitely ascertained, but it has been learned that Stu Major has just returned from an extended trip. Since Stu has free passage rights on all the railway trains and steamers, this has not proved to be a fruitful clue to the solution of the mystery.

All those who have reserved their tickets are asked to take them up at once in order to avoid inconvenience to all concerned. The names and phone numbers of the members of the committee are: Bob Johnston, 3126-F; Walt Horn, 4194; Art Hall, 1896-J; Stu Major, 1956-M; Chuck O'Neil, 149-M; Ken Heath, 1896-J; Roy Sharp, 477-F; Max Rapoport, 1035-W; and Convener Halpenny, 3414.

Junior Team Meets Frontenacs To-Night

The Tricolor Juniors resume their feud with the younger Frontenacs on Friday evening, in the second game of the junior series. The first game was such a nip and tuck struggle and contained so much pep and fight that the customers are bound to flock to the scene of the encounter in large numbers.

While Queen's won the initial puck barging tilt, it was not a clear cut victory for the score was tied up on numerous occasions and both teams missed many chances to win the game in the regulation time.

Queen's won because they pressed everlastingly and were going strong at the finish, and appeared to have a shade on condition.

On the other hand the Tricolor youngsters were playing their first game with a strange lot of men, and while they went great guns in practice they failed to click as well as they might under fire.

Wally Elmer has had them on the frozen water for numerous practices and if they do not show great improvement in their methods of attack and defence it will not be his fault.

Manager Baker reports that a game scheduled for Monday evening in Brockville, as a little conditioner, and exhibition had to be called off when the town got so hot the water wouldn't freeze. However, the Juniors will be ready to go another ninety minutes if necessary to pull out with a win.

Coach Elmer used Johnny Wing with the Seniors in the game against Kingston but Wing has been returned to the Juniors for the balance of the season and fans will get an eyeful watching this chap go through the Frontenacs.

On the defence he will have able assistance from Smith while Christie, Brydon and McQuaig will be doing things along the front line.

As a second trio the coach will drop Corrigan, Lewis and G. Gibson over the boards with McNab subbing for James in goal.

Kingston will line up pretty much as in the first game and Boyer confidently expects his charges to bring home the pork.

Hockey fans should not pass up this game as it promises to be one of the most hard fought of the present season.

Canada Has Acquired A National But Not An International Mind

Says Vincent Massey Speaking On "Canada And Outside World"

HON. VINCENT MASSEY

"We can, I think honestly say that we have acquired in a complete sense a national mind. We have still to acquire in Canada the international mind. This second phase of development, I need not point out, is not in conflict with the first. National feeling and an international sense are compatible," declared the Hon. Vincent Massey in his lecture on "Canada and the Outside World" in Convocation Hall yesterday. "We cannot have nationality rightly understood and practised in a country like ours unless we can see our national unit in relation to others. Just as, on the other hand we cannot acquire an international sense in any real degree unless we have a national self-consciousness first."

Mr. Massey had compared the present depression to the dark ages as being merely a period of chaos between two eras. Such a condition as exists to-day is vastly useful in revealing some of those elements in our social and economic structure which were obscured by the whitewash of artificial prosperity.

Canada among other countries has not as yet fully developed her international co-operation. The "sacred principle of international distrust" seems to be the only unifying principle among the nations. World conferences indicate a growing realization that world ills can only be cured by world measures. It is hard to

Short Story To Be Topic of English Club

Mrs. Eric Duthie Will Address Club Meeting

An interesting feature of the English Club meeting this Wednesday afternoon at 4 P.M. will be a talk on the contemporary short story in English by Mrs. Eric Duthie.

Mrs. Duthie is an accomplished Literary critic and has written short stories, contributing to such periodicals as the Queen's Quarterly under the pen name of Marion Nelson. Her talk should prove invaluable to those aspiring to write stories and to those who wish to gain a better appreciation of this literary form.

Refreshments will be served. The executive of the club extends a cordial invitation to all. The place: Red Room: day: Wednesday; time: 4 P.M.

The meetings of the English Club are proving to be highly interesting and to date many students have lent their encouragement to the officers, who are doing their utmost to provide interesting and instructive programs.

Technocracy Origin Lies In Technology

Technocracy Not New Idea Says J. O. Watts

The origin of technocracy lies in technology and goes back as far as 1920, declared Captain J. O. Watts at the last meeting of the Men's Forum. It was about this time that Columbia University sponsored an energy survey of the United States to be carried out by scientists, engineers, chemists, i.e., specialists in each field. The men carrying out this survey came to be known as technologists and the science of collecting and arranging data on every known industrial process became known as technology.

This work has been steadily carried on since that time and from it has emerged the idea of technocracy, which is in itself a form of government; a government controlled by technocrats, the originators of the idea, and using as a basis the science of technology.

The principle involved is that energy should be the basis of exchange. A man's value to the system is measured by the energy expended, and in return for work done he should receive the equivalent in other forms of energy, either as foodstuffs, wearing apparel, or any of the other numerous forms available. They would replace the gold standard with an energy standard.

The technologists have estimated that the potential energy of the North American Continent is equal to 1000 horse-power per family. However they have failed to mention whether this energy is to be made available to each individual family. If it is we at once have a form of socialism, but any connection with socialism or communism is denied by them.

They maintain that were it possible to reach again the production peak of 1929, only half the present eleven million unemployed in the United States could return to work, due to the fact that vast improvements have been made in every line of production. Another estimate is, that 660 hours of machine labour per man each year will be sufficient to produce ten times the comforts needed, and then only men between the ages of 25 and 45 would be employed.

Nothing To Stop Immigrant Flow Says V. Massey

Hon. Vincent Massey Thinks Canada Still Able To Absorb Many

By E. H. Gilmour

"I can see no reason why the stream of immigration should not flow again," declared the Hon. Vincent Massey yesterday afternoon in answer to my question whether he did not agree that the population of Canada was near saturation point. "I expect to see the re-establishment of immigration into Canada as soon as conditions become settled" he continued, "but at present they are in such a state of flux that I hesitate to give a categorical answer."

By what forms of occupation was such an influx of population to be absorbed, I asked, quoting Premier Taschereau's view that mixed farming offered a field of great opportunity. Mr. Massey expressed himself as unready to answer this question offhand, but suggested that "it is generally recognized that the northern part of the three prairie provinces is well adapted to mixed farming." As to wheat farming, the position s more uncertain; "there are questions attached to this problem for which we have no answer as yet" he stated.

The rivalry between Vancouver and Montreal as grain exporting centres has been exaggerated, Mr. Massey believed; there is a fairly well defined "watershed" in Eastern Saskatchewan determining whether grain should move east or west across Canada.

On the subject of Canada's position in the field of world politics "There is a good deal of truth," Mr. Massey told me, "in the after dinner observation that Canada has an interpretative role to play between England and the United States. I was very conscious of the fact when I was in Washington" he went on, in a passing reference to his four years' experience as Canadian Minister to the United States,

JEAN NELSON

ELIZABETH CAMERON

Expert co-ed diver who will add much dash and color to the Meet this evening. She will take part in a diving exhibition with Miss Nelson.

Inter-Faculty Swimming Meet Scheduled For This Evening In New Gymnasium

Daring Co-ed Divers, Elizabeth Cameron And Jean Nelson, Will Put on Diving Exhibition

Final preparations have been completed and now all is in readiness for the Interfaculty Swimming meet which takes place to-night at the Gymnasium. As an added attraction to an already interesting programme, Albert College, Belleville, will meet the Kingston Y.M.C.A. swimmers in a return engagement.

Such Queen's stars as Anglin, perry, Shapiro, Watts, Almquist, and O'Connor are looking forward with eagerness for the starting gun. Kingston stars such as Green, Kelley and Harris are sure to be good drawing cards in the great swimming extravaganza to-night.

Perhaps the most interesting item of the evening will be the diving exhibition by the Queen's team, which will feature those daring divers, Jean Nelson and Elizabeth Cameron.

A series of ten combination dives will be done by all or some of the eight members of the team, which includes, besides the two coed performers, Messrs. Forsberg, Southern, McKerracher, Howard and Ross.

The Meet is scheduled to start at 8.15 p.m.

Due to the lengthy swimming programme there will be no water polo on the card, but everything is set for the week-end of February 4th when Queen's will be at home to the Varsity swimmers, this year's Intercollegiate water polo champion. The Queen's second team will meet on the same night a local all-star team.

When asked by a Journal reporter whether the student admission tickets would be good for the meet to-night the Secretary of the Athletic Board said that unfortunately these tickets would not be honoured. An admission charge of 25c will prevail.

Queen's Faculty Players Plan to Produce Shakespearean Comedy "Twelfth Night"

Featuring a number of stars from former productions, backed by an excellent cast under the direction of Prof. Roy, the Faculty players should add more laurels to their already high reputation when they present "Twelfth Night" in Convocation Hall on Feb. 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th.

Their choice of a Shakespearean play is in keeping with the high standard set in other years. It is rather more than a coincidence that four members of the Medical faculty have leading roles: Drs. Etherington, Macgregor, Orr and Austin are cast as Malvolio, the Clown, the Duke, and Sir Toby Belch, respectively.

Other outstanding players are Miss Laird as Olivia; Mr. Conacher as Sir Andrew Aguecheek; Mrs. Fyfe as Viola; and Miss Farrell as Maria. All these will be remembered for their work in previous performances. Incidental music furnished by an orchestra under the able baton of Prof. Tracy, should add to the attractiveness of the play.

Dr. Neish has charge of the business end and will receive orders for tickets from members commencing Monday, Jan. 23rd. The plan opens for the general public on Saturday morning at the Public Library. Wednesday, Feb. 1st is students' night; admission, 35 cents. For Thursday and Friday evenings the price is set at 50 and 75 cents. A matinee Saturday afternoon is open to K.C.I. students; admission, 25 cents.

O. H. A. Scholarship Awarded To J. Wing

Awarded For Athletic And Academic Effort

On Saturday evening it was announced that Johnny Wing, the clever centre of Queen's Junior hockey team, had been awarded an Ontario Hockey Association Scholarship.

This award is presented by the above Association to an athlete who achieves a high academic standard and who is in addition, a clean, effective hockey player. The value is $100.00.

Queen's students will agree that the award this year could not have been given to a more suitable applicant than Johnny. He posesses all qualifications to the u'th degree and congratulations are in order.

There are few branches of athletics in which Johnny does not shine. He is an expert paddler and has won many awards in this field. Since entering Queen's he has revealed himself as a capable rugby player. He was at half on the Junior team this year.

Careful Planning Assures Success Of Arts Formal

Conscientious Work Of Formal Committee Now Nearing An End

Weeks of planning and working by a conscientious committee are now showing definite results. Those responsible for the success of the Arts At Home are looking after every detail to ensure a perfect evening for those who will attend the big affair this coming Friday evening. All of the outstanding features have already been attended to and now only the mechanical work remains to be done.

The Convener is feeling quite proud of his selection of Ken Large's orchestra to provide the music. The program, which will be found elsewhere in this issue, represents a group of numbers which have been chosen from those heard on the CKAC programs recently. Anyone who has listened in on the "Knights of Sweet Music" is almost automatically convinced that no better choice could have been made. As a matter of fact, an unnamed music critic was heard to express his opinion that, over the air, he preferred Ken Large's program to that of Guy Lombardo. "That slow, soft harmony just seems to filter into your bones," he said. The vocalist, Sonny Green, is a discovery of the band leader and easily surpasses anyone that has been heard in Kingston.

That the orchestra has been an exceptional drawing power is being proved by the sale of tickets. No figures are being released by the committee, but it is understood that over 80% of the first list of invitations made out was for out-of-towners. As the total number of invitations is large, this indication of approval of the efforts of the Arts Committee is well worth noting. It is hoped that all the names of the parties will be in the ballot boxes that have been provided not later than Wednesday. The boxes will be cleared on Wednesday afternoon

Newspaper Scheme Decided For Union

At a recent meeting of the House Committee it was decided that action must be taken to remedy the Sunday paper situation in the Union. For some considerable time the Committee have been very dissatisfied with the treatment which Sunday papers have been receiving from students. Almost as soon as the papers arrive they are broken up into several separate parts and quickly become littered about the Union.

It was decided that the experiment should be tried of placing the papers in rack-holders, but that if they continued to be distributed around in the present untidy fashion it would become necessary for the Committee to discontinue providing Sunday papers.

Crystal Gazing

What will be the outstanding events of 1933? Shall we be more prosperous? Will the world be thrilled by some great adventure? Will there be great changes in our social order? These are surely but a few of the questions which are engaging the attention of the leaders in the field of world-wide activity. In an article published in a recent number of "The Passing Show," eight famous men and women tell what they expect to see this year.

Reduction of taxes, greater employment, a return to "common sense," and the conquest of Mount Everest are but a few of the events which are in the offing, if we are to place much faith in the crystal gazing which these distinguished persons undertake for "The Passing Show."

The tone of their message is one of optimism and confidence in the world's power to stem the unfavourable tide of the present upheaval. Sir Kingsley Wood, British Postmaster-General, is one of the many who hold this opinion. He says: "The National Government, by international action, by the protection of our own industries, and by the maintenance of a sound financial system, will, I hope, make a considerable contribution to securing better times and more employment in 1933."

Sir Josiah Stamp, chairman of the L.M.S. Railway and director of the Bank of England, believes that one of the outstanding events of the year will be the Economic Conference, which will determine whether we are going to sink ourselves still further in economic fallacies and the vices of nationalism.

In violent contrast to the views of Sir Kingsley Wood, and lending weight to the beliefs of Sir Josiah Stamp, comes the statement by Lord Arnold, the Labour Peer and financial expert, that in home politics the chief event of 1933 will be increasing dissatisfaction with the so-called National Government — particularly with its failure to deal with unemployment.

Perhaps the most absurd and meaningless forecast is advanced by Sir Stafford Cripps, a former Attorney-General and now a leading member of the Opposition. Sir Stafford says this year we shall realise that we must organize "mass-consumption" to deal with mass-production. This statement, in our opinion, is another illustration that there is nothing new under the sun, not even a fantastic view. It is a repetition of the old, old story about placing the horse before the cart, for the condition and extent of consumption is largely dependent upon production, and it is hardly possible to apply the term "Mass-production" to our present day industries. It would seem, therefore, that our most pressing problem to-day is not to organize consumption but to re-organize industry. By so doing consumption power—which under our present system is more other than purchasing power—will inevitably be raised. Sir Stafford concludes his statement by saying that we shall have to produce things not for profit, but because they are needed. Because of this, 1933 will mark another milestone on the road to Socialism. We are hearing more and more about Socialism, but the theories advanced so far have not withstood close examination. Sir Stafford's theories do not escape this criticism.

The crystal gazing of these eminent people, while most interesting in itself, fails to strike an appreciative note in our mind. The question "What will be the outstanding event of 1933?" has not been satisfactorily answered. But then the fact that these contributors have been successful politicians or even distinguished economists does little to fit them to answer such a question. Even Mr. Shaw would be at a loss, though that, as Euclid might have written, is absurd.

Get Yourself A Background

Social contacts and poise, you probably have been told on numerous occasions, are the sole and only benefits to be realized from attendance in an institution of higher education. The next time somebody says that, you might send him over to the art school. Tell him to ask one of the professors how Rembrandt and the other great masters of painting obtained their effect. If he does any independent thinking, he probably will alter considerably his ideas on the importance of social attributes and graces, not that they aren't valuable to a high degree.

Rembramlt's masterpieces were not great because the central figure dominated the scene. Rather were they noteworthy because the rest of the canvas was as fine and excellent as the object which was the theme of the painting. The great Dutch artist achieved greatness because the background of his splendid paintings were as correct in detail and excellent in technique as the dominant character, thereby magnetizing attention on the entire canvas instead of its integral.

What is true of paintings is also true of human beings:— The person with social graces and poise, but who has nothing with which to back up these attributes, constantly focuses attention on himself. He is the dominant theme of everything he does. And, sooner or later, his friends and his foes begin to see his flaws. No one is perfect, and the surest way to make your detriments paramount in the perspective in which others see you is to subordinate all else to yourself.

But the person with a background is like a painting by Rembrandt. He does not make HIMSELF the cynosure of all eyes. Rather, he lets his background, which is just another word for knowledge, speak for itself. The man who can converse intelligently and authoritatively on art, literature, science, history, athletics, government and a thousand and one other topics does not have to push himself forward. His knowledge takes care of that.

Think it over — it's worthwhile. You have an opportunity here to build yourself a background. Don't neglect that in a search after drawing-room graces and dance floor finesse, it is always easier to put across your background than your manners. The former, if it's good, doesn't need a sales talk. The latter, if nothing accompanies them, can't be sent over the pike with the most convincing sales talk ever uttered.

De-Bunking The Old Times

To Booth Tarkington we give a rousing vote of thanks!

For a short span of time immemorial the college generation which we represent has been belittled and scorned by the old timers as a bunch of non-thinking, non-caring, non-working parasites.

Economists from '97 express alarm because we have no interest in politics: Engineers from '09 delight in telling how hard it was for a man to graduate in their time, and so on down through the lists of years and professions is the college student of today scolded at, until he finally must become convinced that he is in truth an inferior figure by records of American history, and that America faces a grave situation with the possibilities of the incoming collegiate regime. Our attention is called to the words of a man prominent in Cincinatti, Rabbi James G. Heller, who has just been given credit for the blunt declaration that we, the collegians, can't even think!

Why you ask, do we vote thanks to Mr. Tarkington? Because that noted Hoosier has given us definite reason for assuming that there may be some slight doubt as to the veracity of these statements which classify us as a bunch of worthless, loafing "Joes". Although Tarkington's welcome statements were made concerning conditions existing at Princeton, his Alma Mater, we refuse to give up hope that what goes for Princeton, also for the general average of American colleges and universities.

Here is Mr. Tarkington's almost unbelievable confession which releases the low-down regarding college life in the old days.

"The Princeton student of today works twenty times as much as we did when we were in college ('93), and when we come back in after-years, it almost seems as if he works too much. I think perhaps we were happier, gayer, and more cheerful than the undergraduates of today, but this is because we were lazier! . . . The men today have a much saner attitude today than we did!"

Fully informed as to the true state of affairs, we are eagerly waiting in ambush on the next old grad who is so unfortunate as to raise his voice against the college students of 1933.

—Purdue Exponent.

Co-education

As long as convention demands that men and women must live together, society should bend every effort to foster understanding between the sexes.

As a result of the above reasoning there was developed a system of co-education. The success of that system is apparent.

We find that college men and women of today get along better than do the graduates of exclusive schools. Figures on numbers of divorces show that men and women from exclusive schools are far less compatible than are the men and women who have spent their college days together.

A continued daily acquaintance with any individual takes out most of the romance and leaves true appreciation.

—Daily Kansan.

Softball hasn't always been taken so seriously. In 1914 the football team of Clemson College went to Richmond, Va., for a game with Virginia Military Institute. When the team came back, all members were ordered arrested by the college heads for leaving the campus without authority.—New Rochelle Standard.

DO STUDENTS KISS?

Los Angeles, Calif. (Ex.)—"A kiss," says Webster, "is a touch or pressure with the lips, as a token of affection, greeting, respect, etc."

Armed with this enlightened definition, a research committee of the University of California students sallied forth—to determine the proportion of college men who have remained unkissed.

We found it necessary to eliminate kisses of respect, but especially kisses from relatives. We insulted several of those questioned by putting on an incredulous air after their affirmative answers, and repeating the latter stipulation.

A psychology professor might take issue with our findings, because we asked only 27 men, and could hardly hope to make accurate calculations from such a meager survey. Nevertheless, this is our story and—(fill in your own variation).

Bashful

Out of the entire 27 we found nine who claimed to be unkissed, but we think they were just bashful. In other words, if our results are accurate, approximately one-third of the men on this campus have never been caught under the mistletoe or cornered in the patio.

On the other hand, there is no doubt that a goodly proportion of those who claim to have been kissed are bragging, while a good many are so unethical as to count "kissing games."

Fraternity Boys Kiss

There was an interesting correlation between the factors of fraternity membership and osculation. Whereas only two-fifths of the fraternity men remained unkissed, fully half of the non-orgs questioned had never been caught.

Prospective journalists either lack that certain something or are less given to boasting than others, or are particularly unromantic, for five out of 11 denied having been kissed.

But then, as Frank Melrose remarks, "A kiss is as good as a smile."—Brunswickian.

Critics of The Drama Blossom Into Poetry

Dear Mr. Editor:

We are moved by the spirit to protest against the absence from your last issue of any notice of the latest production of the Kingston Drama Group. In fact, rightly or wrongly, we feel so very strongly that nothing less, or worse, than verse, will serve to set forth and rehearse the lack of comment in your pages, that horrifies and much enranges all readers loyal to them and you; wherefore the following review:

On Tuesday night in spirit gay
The Drama Group produced a play.
The Kingston Drama Gronp we mean
For other groups would not be seen
Upon the boards in such array—
It was a very feeble play.
The plot was non-existant quite
The lines in it were very light
The man who wrote this play I think
Was not a man unused to drink.
Now Jeffrey was the hero's name
An elocutionist of fame,
Art Sutherland he played this part
And brought to it dynamic art!
When witty lines he tried to say
His boyish hair got in the way.
Too bad this actor's arms weren't longer
To make "Invictus" sound the stronger.
He tried in vain to reach the ceiling.
And launched his epithets with feeling,
So certainly it was a treat
To see his little rosy feet
They were so sweet, but ain't it shockin'
To see a foot without a stockin'?
Our hero loved himself so true
His love alone would do for two
But love tales need another soul
And Martha Johnson played that rôle.
Now Jeff and Janet were engaged
When Jeff was very rude to her
But Jan got suddenly enraged
And wouldn't give her food to her.
She ordered veal or chicken stew
And Jeffry said it wouldn't do.
Our heroine was sweet and gay
And loved in such a simple way
She looked a picture dressed in lace
Her arms were seldom out of place,
And even prudent Doc M——
Could scarce a qualm of conscience feel
About the pure and modest way
She hitched about in negligée.
But quite another thing we think
Was Mrs. Browne, all dressed in pink
(She also dressed in black and green
And did an elocution scene!)
She played the part of Claudia Kitts
And drove the hero into fits.
This youth he slept upon a couch
Till she came in with siren slouch
And she disturbed his dreaming bliss
By planting on his brow a kiss.
He started up, the awkward dummy
And put his foot right on her tummy!
Then in came Janet, very mad,
She thought her boy was being bad.
He gently slapped her on the snout.
She fainted and was carried out!
It should have been a bedroom scene
But these are morally unclean
And can't be shown upon the stage
Our audience would leave in rage.
And so to save it from that doom
They played it in the living room.
The subterfuge worked perfectly
The gallery just screamed with glee!
The hero then with great delight
Played music in the dead of night
This roused the maid, as you'd expect
She and the cook were rather vexed.
Dot Rigney was the maid so slim
And she was sound of wind and limb,
Her mental level tho' was low
She had a soldier for a beau.
The cook, of all those crazy gents,
The only person there of sense;
Instead of throwing things and roaring
She spent the time in mellow snoring.
She was a perfect sketch; in fact
She rather stole the second act.
Now Jeffry had a friend, a freak
Who lent him money every week,
He must have had a lot of dough
He ran about and gambled so.
Good Dr. Bullis played this rôle
His gestures coy were very drole
He tried to marry Claudia Kitts
She moved to fast for his slow wits.
She had a husband anyway
Who came in somewhere in the play.
Then Oliver was Jeff's valet
He had no part at all to play
He just came in so Jeff could tell
Him to get out or go to Hell.
His wits were dim his speech was slow
As tho' his mouth were full of dough
The part was played by Percy Lowe
The plot at last its course had run
And ended where it had begun.
The person who produced this show
Was Mrs. J. C. Goodfellow.
Who worked so hard to make it go.
The title of this farce? Who cares?
They say the thing was called "March Hares."

I am, Mr. Editor,
Sincerely yours,
W. McL. and B.W.

Belts

Lest any suspecting Levanite should chance to wade through this discussion before realising the nature of the subject, let it be understood from the beginning that it is the belt strong and masculine that is discussed. For in women the belt is merely an ornament, as far as we can see, anything from a patent leather ribbon to a string of beads, situated between the latitudes twenty and fifty. There are advertisements for belts that "combine comfort with elegance, freedom of movement with slim willowy grace," but garments with such attributes are not really belts. They the devices of sorcerers, endowed with preternatural powers.

The convenience and reliability of built-in elasticity are not to be denied, but there is that about the circlet of plain leather which keeps man in touch with the stirring crudities of a younger race. A few short centuries ago, the girdle carried man's strength and wealth, the arsenal of the warrior close to his hand, and the script of the scholar close to his heart. As our passions have cooled, the belt has degenerated from its position as the support of our weapons, but has ertained its importance as the repository of man's trust, the magic circle from which depend his honour, his self-respect, and his standing in the community.

There are many, of course, who dispense with a girdle. It is generally believed that the decline or dropping off of the belt has followed the disappearance of the waistline as a recognisable feature. So common has shoulder suspension become among the English nobility that a man who clings to the old-fashioned methods must be differentiated by the specific title of "belted Earl."

In our tenderest years the importance of the belt was strongly impressed upon us, sometimes forcibly impressed upon us. Many of those belonging to the generations that have arisen since the invention of the safety razor retain vivid memories of the gesture with which father loosened his buckle on the way to the woodshed, and in later years the recollection is always accompanied by solemn thoughts of the wrath to come. Perhaps much of our religious feeling has its origin in such experiences. The idea of the belt as the censure of our beings has become so fixed that countless thousands have fallen easy prey to the quack purveyors of supposedly curative appliances to be applied to the drawstring area, such, for instance, as the electric belt which shocks no one but the orthodox physician, and the lumbago belt which is really incapable of producing lumbago, except in those naturally predisposed to such affections.

Belts are sometimes the tools of destiny. Take a belt from Merve Peever for instance, the taking is an easy matter, he gives away samples quite freely, and such a sample has been known to alter the whole course of a man's life and the direction of his nose. Put a belt on a nightshirt and it becomes a crusaders smock; take the belt off a coat and it becomes a last year's model.

As a means of suicide, the belt is an everpresent possibility, but a man must be far gone in despair before he becomes willing to incur the ultimate discovery of his remains with his belt so far displaced as to leave his nether garments unsupported.

The adherer to the principle of the gallus may never know the deep-seated bliss that comes with the letting out of a couple of notches, an operation that we propose to perform now that the Campuscope is finished once more.

Long Undies Definitely On The Shelf In This Era

Long underwear has taken its place on the shelf with grandpa's moustache cup, a survey of Stillwater business houses discloses. 'Tis a sad fate for the garment which once adorned the growing bodies of every mother's son and daughter. What a change from those proud days when the red flannels were next to the skin of every young person from the rock-bound coast of Maine to the water-lapped shore of California! It is a sad picture, this decline from a position of prominence and esteem to a forgotten article of clothing mentioned now only with snickers and smiles.

Nowadays when the chill winds whip through our thin pants and our knees shake together in cold misery, we more than once have longed wistfully for the unbeautiful but comfortably warm undies which covered us from wrist to ankle. Those were days when the revages of cold weather meant nothing more than the opportunity for a good snow fight, and we attribute our change in attitude towards the winter mouths to the fall of the longies.

Of course the long handled underthings had their bad points. For instance, we never mastered the art of wrapping them around our legs so that a big lump didn't disfigure our long black stockings. There were those who accomplished this and made it a fine art. One girl—she had long curls and the cutest bangs — in particular we remember with admiration. So deftly could she put her stockings over her underwear that one could never be sure that she was wearing the long-legged flaanels. But one time she confided that she really did wear them, the same kind as all the rest of the kids, but that she took half an hour or so every morning to adjusting them so that the stockings apparently covered only a pair of gangly legs. After several years of effort we became discouraged and gave up all attempts at keeping the underwear folded nicely. We yanked our stockings on over them with reckless abandon, and let the lumps show where they might. On Sunday mornings, of course, a parental eye saw to it that our nether limbs presented a smoother appearance.

Ah, wonderful memories, those. And somehow we kinda have a dislike for those Beau Brummels who set the styles and make it necessary to freeze in thin shorts, rather than itch in the warm longies.

—Daily O'Collegian

Ratio Perambulators And Babies Constant

The baby carriage is not extinct and baby carriages are still as common as babies. The depression has not diminished the number of baby-airing conveyances and a little survey conducted by two shrewd students on Saturday afternoon reveals the fact that Thomas Thomas Thomas' famous statement to the effect that most of the machinery now in use is over seven years old applies to baby carriages as well as to other branches of locomotory agents.

Interviewed this morning Jim and Russ, who conducted the investigation, were unwilling to make any positive statement which could be misquoted but they admitted that their survey was the aftermath of a visit to the Capitol Theatre on Saturday afternoon. Bedlam broke loose immediately after the lights went out and the multitudinous progeny of Kingston parents expressed themselves so cheerfully all afternoon that two students at least, felt disgusted.

Being statistically inclined Jim and Russ decided to find out what promise there was for future generations of students to hear and see Saturday afternoon movies without having damp lollypops shoved down the backs of their necks or waved under their noses. Outside the Cap. a baby carriage whizzing past took a button off Russ' vest and the enquiry naturally turned to baby carriages.

Although baby carriages were thought to have gone out with street cars in the big holocaust a few years ago there is no evidence to prove this. From Division Street to King Street, thirty-nine baby carriages were counted and each contained anywhere from one to three babies. Retracing their steps the investigators checked up on their count and found that thirty-four baby carriages were abroad in that sector. Jim cannot account for the difference as it was then too late for the matinee and too early for the first evening show and the babies could hardly have ducked into the Sup or Wally Cusick's.

This check goes to prove the old contention that you will always find carriages wherever you find babies and from the number of baby carriages it looks as if it may be laid down as an abiding maxim that students who want to think or sleep should not go to Saturday afternoon matinees. At any rate, baby carriages are here to stay.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

Editor, Queen's Journal.

Dear Sir:

In connection with the activities of certain Fraternal organizations at Queen's may I congratulate "Cicero" for his timely letter on the subject. He must feel elated that his pithy paragraphs have already borne fruit.

Lest the student body have the idea that this Frat. question is purely a disagreement within the ranks of Fourth Year Medicine, let me hasten to advise them that it is rapidly reaching a crisis in the entire Medical Faculty, and is indeed a most serious problem for all Queen's students to consider.

As "Cicero" has pointed out there are many individual members connected with the organization who are personally above reproach. But collectively they constitute a society which has schemed and connived for power with some considerable degree of success, and today they thrive against the expressed wishes of the vast majority of Queen's students. Therein do they reveal themselves as willing to sacrifice the beautiful democracy of Queen's University for their own selfish ends. In short, they do not give a damn for Queen's, so long as they can flout the "holier than thou" attitude in the faces of other Queen's students.

If any should doubt the achievements of this small body of students in the short time it has been in existence, let them carefully take note of the appointments to various managerial posts and Union committees. Were Juniors ever appointed to such posts in years past, or were they reserved for Seniors?

An example of the harm this organization has already created is well illustrated in Fourth year Medicine, where ill feeling has already been created that will last long after graduation days.

Lastly, Queen's has gone on record as being absolutely opposed to fraternities and their machinations. This cancer must be destroyed ere it wreck one of the grandest traditions of this university, I mean democracy.

—A Queen's Democrat.

THE CONQUERORS
With Richard Dix and Ann Harding

The Conquerors is the story of an American pioneer family—their adventures and triumphs, and hardships in the great open spaces.

It is at the same time a sweeping survey of the history and development of the United States between the years 1873 and 1931. Yes, it does include the Depression, not to mention the Great War, the first aeroplane and the Gibson Girls. Consequently, it consists of a series of episodes which are very brief and rather poorly connected. The latter half of the picture drags, partly because it is unrelieved by the humour of Guy Kibbee who, as "Doc" Blake, gives a finished performance in the first scenes. His wife, Matilda Blake, is equally good. Ann Harding and Richard Dix are satisfactory, if not brilliant.

A word might here be said about the rather annoying methods adopted by the movies in presenting the cast. The names of the actors playing in the picture are flashed on the screen for an instant, but no hint is given as to the rôle each takes, and unless one is familiar with all the players, one has no idea who they are. The result presents somewhat of a problem to the would-be reviewer.

The Conquerors deserves at best a B—.

AT THE TIVOLI

By popular request "Smiling Thru," which appeared at the Capitol, is now playing at the Tivoli for a run of three days. This is an excellent production. It was accorded an A— by the Journal reviewer on the occasion of its first appearance here.

Interesting Facts About Popular Reading Disclosed

Interesting and significant facts about popular reading in free libraries are disclosed in the annual report of the New York Public Library System. They had a total circulation for home use of 10,227,337 volumes, which affords a substantial basis for judging the literary proclivities of a cosmopolitan population in any centre. Did these avid seekers for knowledge and recreation fly in hot taste after the six or sixteen best selling novels? Did they sniff disdainfully at the accepted "classics," which the young "intellectuals" of our enlightened times pronounce hopelessly old fashioned and out of date? Quite the contrary.

These readers made such demands for the great Victorians and Sir Walter Scott and the subsidiary stars of the English constellation, together with Cooper, Hawthorne and the parallel American classics that the stupendous library system could not supply the requirements. Books by Scott, Dickens, Thackeray and other "standard authors" were literally read to tatters.

The current best sellers had their army of readers, but their popularity was far exceeded by the "standard authors." Democratic tastes in literature are thus shown to offer keen encouragement to all who believe that the ordinary trend of our civilization conduces to the uplift of the plain people. Most encouraging sign of all is the report that the approved English and American classics has been greatest in those districts where the foreign population is densest.

Apparently, library readers who resort to the reading rooms, are not attracted there merely by the froth of literature or attractions of fiction. Poetry, drama, essays, literary history, economics, history and biography, together with periodicals from which literary and economic material may be gleaned, were all in high favor during the year, as systematically noted when books were called for in written slips by readers of this class. No doubt a similar analysis of the Philadelphia Free Library system would yield like results —Philadelphia Evening Bulletin

THE HISTORICAL NOVEL

Opinions are continually being battledored back and forth between critics as to the merits or demerits of the historical novel. Extremists like Prosper Mérimée, label it a bastard among its literary brothers. Others, aver that it is either so difficult as to be impossible or too easy to be worth while. A few voice opinions running the whole gamut of eulogy; the public hack these last up to the last ditch. All one needs to do, to realize what a tremendous appeal the historical romance has for humankind is to observe the current vogue in reading matter, or to recall the plaudits of the multitude, evoked by the screen versions of Ben Hur and Quo Vadis.

But in attempting to answer the question, (what is an historical novel?) many pitfalls await our unwary feet. Far be it from me to essay a succinct, definite answer when many others, endowed with "magnificent manifestations of pedantry," have shied at the task. It seems that a spade cannot be called a spade without hedging in the definition with a hundred ifs and buts. Some critics disavow the existence of such a literary genre. Brander Matthews would apply the term to those novels which depict contemporary times, which is altogether at odds with current usage. Nor can we expect fiction to represent the past literally. For by no tour de force can an author cast off his nationalistic, modernistic prejudices and view the past with a wholly objective eye; there is no certain means of seeing behind the facts of recorded history into the lives and minds of the people of bygone ages.

There have been great antiquarians, however, like Sir Walter Scott, steeped in the lore of genealogy, legend, and knight errantry, who have attuned their minds to reasonably close harmony with earlier periods. But all attempts prior to Scott (literary historians to the contrary notwitstanding) were failures. Even in Ivanhoe the historical machinery lumbers and creaks at times. One critic, at least has had the courage to specify the place of history in fiction. Professor Saintsbury says, "The true historical novelist employs the readers presumed interest in historical scene and character as an instrument to make his work attractive. Very often, however, history plays a very insignificant part. Especially is this so in modern pseudo-historical romances that spring up like mushrooms every year. And what about such classics as the "Bride of Lammermoor?" I am fain to believe that the appeal of this book springs from interest in the piquant legend, not the history.

We may as well admit that this literary genre has the qualities and its defects. Yet these defects are more apparent than real. After all, the story's the thing and a good tale is only secondarily dependent on the validity of its historical matter. For that reason one should not put much credence in the idea that historical novels teach history. Since truth is stranger than fiction, falsification of history is often justifiable in the interests of plausibility. And an examination of many good tales will bear out this contention.

To-day, many authors are following in the tradition of Sir Walter Scott, and indeed, his view that earlier periods of time offered the most suitable background for the full play of romantic ideas is essentially sound. Naomi Mitchison's "The Conquered" is probably the best historical novel of recent years.

Critics hand the laurels to Willa Cather for her "Shadows on the Rock". The novels of Stanley Weyman are worthy of note, and such writers as Farnol, Sabatini, Cunningham, Barrington have done good work in this field. This list could be lengthened to infinity, but I leave that to chance readers of this column.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

January 22, 1933.

The Editor,
Queen's Journal.

Dear Sir:

I think most of us realize now that the idea of the Frosh being better students and university supporters if they were not initiated is a myth. I'm not denying the student part, they may be, but there is absolutely no spirit in their years, only an informal amount of I-know-it-allness, in the individual which initiation takes out of most.

I do not wish to be misunderstood, Mr. Editor, I am not in favour of making anyone miserable for a year, but I do think a mild dose of what the Sophomores gave the Frosh last year would help them a lot, and at the same time do no lasting harm. It calms down that exuberant know-it-allness and turns a little pest into an amazingly considerate person, a little thing most of us lack when we first come here.

An amazing incident brought this letter into my mind. A friend who happens to be in a position to make a statement, made one about an organization here at the college. He was immediately attacked from all sides with authoritative statements from the Frosh who had been eaves dropping. (P.S., he wasn't speaking to them) and had to escape to keep his senses.

Another time, two fellows were talking of last year's boat-trip when some Frosh interrupted and gave a very lucid account of what happened to the voyagers. It never struck him that the two men he was speaking to had been on the trip and that his recital was that kind which grows and grows all the time. They had to get up and leave to dispose of this walking History of Queen's. Moral, "Never mention anything that happened at Queen's less than a week ago for a Frosh will know more about it than the man who did it.

I'm all in favour for an initiation similar to last year's, provided these upstarts don't administer it because they would probably go to extremes.

In a more serious vein, Mr. Editor, I think a movement should be set on foot to get a substantial grant for the band and a small honorarium for the master, whose work is pretty hard and goes unrecognized. Queen's band serves us well, why can't we do something for it and encourage the members in their work.

Thank you for your space, Mr. Editor.

Yours sincerely,
"Memo Neminis."

P.S.—The writer has no connection with the band.

MUSIC

Last Thursday the Music Club availed itself of Dr. Vlastos' hospitality. The first part of the program consisted of Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, with an introductory record in which Stowkowski gave some account of the composition and its composer, indicating the themes. He considered it to be the expression of a cloistered soul, but curiously enough some of the themes reminded the reviewer of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony. Next came six of Schubert's melancholy songs. Apparently it took sad poetry to draw forth Schubert's glorious melodies, for with few exceptions all his songs are written to poems setting forth the depths of despair. One of them, perhaps the saddest, depicts a youth who having foolishly deserted the highway, finds himself in the midst of a wilderness, confronted by a guide-post pointing not to sanctuary but "to that bourne whence no traveller may return."

Next Thursday at seven the meeting will be held at Dr. Frost's, where in addition to recordings of Mendelssohn and Beethoven, Mr. Barber will play his violin.

This will be the first performance by a member of the Club and so an event of some importance. It is hoped that it will be the first of a series of even finer programs than have hitherto been presented.

Student Applies For Job In Georgia Chain Gang

"I am told that employment may be obtained on the Georgia chain-gang during the Winter months," a college student from Wisconsin wrote to the Governor of Georgia, asking for a position. The reply came at once, stating that there were "no vacancies."

Students Try Plans To Get Professors' Goats

Students at the University of Washington insist upon making life miserable for faculty members. Prof. M. E. Benson, of the English department, told a member of his freshman class to clean his typewriter with gasoline and a toothbrush before handing in any more themes. The student did as directed, then wrote to the professor that he could no longer brush his teeth, and threatened to take the matter up with the board of regents.

B.W.F. Men Win Meet With Ottawa

Queen's Boxers And Wrestlers Perform Creditably Against Invaders From Ottawa

By "Scotty" McGowan.

Saturday night the Gym. was jammed to the rafters to witness the mit and mat men do their stuff against an all star team from Ottawa. Fully 2000 people were there to give their support to the exponents of the manly art and judging by this great turn out it will not be long before B.W.F. will be a major sport at Queen's. Great credit is coming to Manager H. Allan for the capable manner in which the show was run off. Everything ran as smoothly as a well oiled machine, no hitches, no long waits between events and, taking all in all, one of the smoothest meets run here in many years. Good work Pasty. For a long time the wrestlers have had to take a back seat to the boxers, because in the past they have not been as spectacular. However, the wrestlers came in to their own on Saturday night and in the opinion of many of the fight fans they stole the Show. The writer foretold something of this in last week's Journal. The great improvement in wrestling is due to the efforts of "Jimmy" Bews who has for years tried to open up the game and has at last apparently done so. No longer will the wrestling matches be neglected in favour of a smoke as has been the custom for the last few years by a certain element. To become a good wrestler is not the work of a few weeks; it means months of hard work in the Gym with very little reward for it. And so if at any time a bout seems a little slow, be kind in your judgment as the boys are doing their best and their only reward is the appreciation of the audience.

Coach Jack Jarvis is once again in the process of building up a new boxing team and by the time the Inter-collegiate rolls around will have as he always has the most feared boxers in the Meet. The genial Jack's championship team of last year has been wrecked by exams. and graduations, and so all the boys who fought for Queen's on Saturday night against Ottawa were fighting before the home crowd for the first time. Keeping this in mind the boxers made a very creditable showing against more experienced opponents, and after a few more fights will be a classy organization. Unfortunately Ottawa were unable to bring an opponent for Merve Peever, and all efforts on the part of the Coach to secure a fight for the Queen's flash were unavailing. It was even suggested that the Ottawa middle weight take Peever on, but this got a mighty poor reception from Ottawa.

It would be a tough proposition to pick an outstanding star among the boxers because, win, lose, or draw they all did well. Ewen, Macdonald, Binch and Peters, are however worthy of special mention.

118 lbs.—McGill of Queen's took on a tough customer in Collins of Ottawa, who is the veteran of many a fistic encounter. Nevertheless McGill, although it was his first time through the ropes carried the fight right to his redoubtable opponent and although a hard drive to the solar plexus brought the fight to a quick finish, on a return engagement there might be a different ending.

140 lbs.—J. MacDonald fought Ewen's opponent of last week, J. Van Allan, and certainly made a good job of it. From the first gong to the last 'Mac' was on top and never at any time was he in danger; with a little more experience he could have had his adversary take the long count in the second round. "Mac" is a nice clean heady fighter and before long will be a great favourite with the fight fans of Kingston.

135 lbs.—Cliff Campbell, after clearly winning the first round of his battle with Brown of Ottawa Y stepped into a fast one that everybody saw but him, and the fight ended. This happens to the best of fighters once and Saturday night was Campbell's turn. Pay no attention, Cliff, you just learned a little lesson and we are all backing you to win at Montreal.

158 lbs.—R. Binch had a big heart to mix it with F. D. Dickens, Ottawa star. It was Binch's first time in the ring and his showing was a great credit to himself and to the Boxing Coach. A rapier like left and stinging right secured a draw for him which might have easily been a K.O. had he had any experience. He is a comer.

165 lbs.—Jimmy Peters, although he lost the decision to O. Dickens was probably the most popular fighter in the Assault. Jimmy is another beginner and made his debut on Saturday night. He displayed a fast left, a hard right, and a big heart which won the admiration of everyone at the fights. With a few fights under his belt he could have stopped his man in the second round. In the vernacular of the ring Peters is a "Dooser" and a comer of real ability.

Heavy Weight—This fight was put up by home talent, "Killer" Weir vs. Code. It was a regular Donneybrook from start to finish. Code was the aggressor all the way but Killer stood back and cooly speared him with a hard right, and took the decision which was close. A few more fights would do a great deal for both boys.

The Wrestlers showed real class in taking 4 out of 5 bouts from Ottawa. Superior ability and a better knowledge of the game carried Queen's to victory. The outstanding bout of the evening was Gordie McMahon vs. J. Stern of St. Pat's College, Ottawa. In the opinion of those who are well versed in the mat game this was one of the best wrestling matches ever witnessed at Queen's. Certain it is that Gordie had to use his whole bag of tricks to win a decision over the St. Pat's star. It is bouts like this which will give wrestling the popularity it deserves.

B. May represented Queen's in this fight against Woods of Ottawa. This was May's first start and he showed ability in securing the first fall. He nearly got a second fall but was short on condition, and the Ottawa boy got two falls to win the bout. A little more condition will make May a real threat.

135 lbs.—As the writer prophesied last week Jimmy Campbell came through with another victory over Holmes of Ottawa. Jimmy had his man close to a fall on several occasions before pinning his shoulders to the mat in 4 minutes. Unfortunately Holmes suffered a broken rib and could not continue the bout.

145 lbs.—Johnson, Science Soph., made his debut with Chapman of the Capitol city. This was a ding dong battle from start to finish and Johnson did well to beat the man who gave Hutchison such a hard fight in Ottawa a week ago. This boy Johnson is going to be mighty hard to keep off the Intercollegiate team.

Heavyweight Wrestling — As usual "Husky" Henry Hosking the big threat for the light heavyweight title in the intercollegiate for the fourth time came through with another win. His opponent was C. Casserly, heavyweight champ. of Ottawa. Henry waded into his man in his usual manner and after about 4 minutes of wrestling secured a fall. In throwing him Henry broke his opponent's rib. The fight naturally ended at this point and once again Hosking was declared winner. In fact in four years of wrestling Henry has won so often that we could hardly imagine him losing a fight. Another championship this year will complete four years of active wrestling without a recognized defeat.

During the Freshman-Sophomore games at M.I.T., which resulted in a 13-0 victory for the second year men, 29 crates of eggs and 10 crates of fruit were thrown. This barrage was considerably less than 1930's when a part of the ammunition was 120 crates of eggs.—Albrightian.

He: Holy smoke!—what's the matter?"

She: "That last cocktail's taken advantage of me."

Kingston Beaten By Queen's Juniors 2-0

In a close-checking, hard skating game, Queen's batted out their second win over Kingston to the tune of 2 to 0 in a Jr. O.H.A. fixture at the Harty Arena Friday night. Queen's were held scoreless for two periods until Wing and Smith combined in the third to break the deadlock.

The Blue and White youngsters, aided by the return of Harry Samwell, erstwhile heavyweight boxer, to his regular rearguard position, presented a closer-knit defence than in the last game. Wally Elmer also brought forth a new defence in Smith and Pettit, with Gibson in reserve, while Johnny Wing was shifted up to his regular position as pivot man. Both defences handed out lusty body checks throughout the game, which was comparatively clean.

Wing opened the proceedings with a bang in the first session when he tore in on Sharpe who made a great save on Wing's shot. Laird came back with the puck and weaved his way through defence only to have James stop his shot. Wing and Bain broke loose and the centre man sifted a hard one at the Kingston net, but Sharpe stopped it. "Daz" Guy rushed it back but met a stonewall Tricolor defence.

Wing and McQuaig made things hot for Sharpe as the period ended with no scoring.

Kingston unleashed a hard attack as the second round opened and the Tricolor defence had a tough time staving off their rushes. Smith took a terrific bounce when he attempted to stop O'Hearn and Samwell barged into him again to flatten him. Christie worked like a Trojan on his wing, but was not rewarded with a goal. With Catlin off for slashing, Queen's pressed hard, but were unsuccessful. Samwell came down fast and in the mad scramble in front of the nets almost scored. Brydon and McQuaig made things interesting for Sharpe, but he cleared all shots. When Samwell was banished for slapping McQuaig down, Wing tore in and rifled a shot at the Kingston net janitor who caught it and fell. The Tricolor had a great chance to score when Gordon was benched and Kingston two men short, but there was nothing doing. Brydon caused the crowd much anxiety when his pants parted from their moorings, but the period ended just in time.

The Tricolor began to put the screws on in the third period and were finally rewarded when Smith laid a perfect pass over to King who drifted in to flip the rubber over the prostrate goalie. Not satisfied with one counter, Bain and Wing tried for another but Sharpe held them off. Samwell charged Bain and was exiled. The Queen's forwards rained a hail of shots on the Kingston nets and Wing again brought the red light on with a hard shot which was allowed, after a controversy with the goal umpire, much to the disapproval of the Kingston fans.

The Limestone City team tried hard, but the Tricolor wings checked consistently and they couldn't score. When Wing was sent to the cooler for tripping, Kingston turned on the juice in a last desperate effort, but the game ended with no further scoring.

The Juniors turned in another nice effort to take their second straight game from Frontenacs. They had to play real hockey to do it, but it was in them.

* * * * * *

When the Tricolor Juniors took the first game after 30 minutes overtime, the Kingston fans went out muttering in their beards about what would happen in the second encounter. The 2 to 0 kalsomine wasn't looked for.

* * * * * *

Jack Jarvis and Jimmy Bews must feel well repaid for their efforts when they gaze upon the handiwork of their boxers and wrestlers in action. The B. W. & F. squad is fast climbing into the limelight, as it deserves.

The senior Basketball team will enter its final week of training, and should begin Saturday's first game with Varsity here in the pink of condition.

Warren Stevens will present a fast tricky Blue and White team in an effort to achieve success as a basketball coach, he having already garnered a few sheaves as a rugby mentor.

Apparently there is need for an explanation as to what the S.C.M. is, its extent and purpose. The letters stand for Student Christian Movement. There is a local organization on the Campus of every bigger university in Canada. All local groups are connected with the Central Office in Toronto. But the S.C.M. is not confined to Canada. There are Student Christian Movements in almost every country of the globe, U.S.A., Great Britain, Germany, Russia, China and India, to mention a few of them. These national organizations, are in turn linked with the World's Student Christian Federation. (W.S.C.F.) which has its headquarters at Geneva. It is an error to think of the S.C.M. as a limited group of piously sentimental students on a local campus.

Occasionally the charge has been heard that the S.C.M. groups are only glorified Sunday School classes. As often, this reveals more about the critic than it does about the groups or organizations, one fears that this attitude comes from an inadequate idea of religion. Religion is sometimes regarded as a primitive emotional expression, and Christianity a hollow formula quite unrelated to the activities of living. It is to find out what religion is, its relation to life, or more broadly speaking, to find out what life is and how to live it that the S.C.M. exists. Hence, included in the topics for discussion on this campus are such subjects as "Technocracy," "The Canadian Prison System," "Socialism," "Religion and International Relations." If these are Sunday School topics then our statesmen and economists are still in Sunday School.

If group study fails, as it often does, it is due either to inadequate leadership, or lack of material to lead. If, in the past two or three years, groups on this campus have failed it certainly has not been through inadequate leadership. Queen's is fortunate in this respect.

If any one has good heretical views, or an intellectual bomb to throw, come into some of these groups and drop it. It won't do much harm and may do a lot of good. The only requisite is that it be of an intellectual quality worthy of a university.

McMaster Students State Why They Dislike Gowns

Apparently some enterprising students at McMaster detest gowns and dignity to the extent of getting up the following petition to be signed and posting on the main notice board:

DOWN WITH DIGNITY
DOWN WITH GOWNS
(they trail in the dust and are unsanitary)

Why.

1. We don't want them.
2. We can't afford them.
3. The profs. will feel cheap if everybody steals their thunder by wearing them.
4. They give the place a funereal aspect.
5. You trip over them going up stairs, thereby raising the insurance rate.
6. They are sissy.

Give us your O.K. below.

This petition was signed by such prominent members of the McMaster student body as Joe Burke and Joe Collich, Walt Metcalfe and Adam 'n Eve, J. E. Baird and Julius Seize Her, Gordon New and Florence Flask, and many others. —McMaster Silhouette.

Canada Has National Mind Says Massey

believe in the doctrine of salvation by conference when it is effective only in relation to the spirit actuating it.

The Canadian is a natural internationalist because his country is not self-sufficient; a sane and peaceful world is essential for trade. Canada has, in the last fifteen years developed an international status therefore she must develop a sound foreign policy. The four agencies through which international contact are maintained are diplomatic missions, consular service, trade commissions and the League of Nations. Canada has no consular service. It is still conducted by Britain to whom she owes a great debt for co-operation in foreign countries. Although Trade Commissioners have made economic contacts in the past, Canada would find it to her advantage to adopt the above form of diplomatic service.

Canada holds a position of influence in the League of Nations as well as being a part of the British Commonwealth which enables her to vote as a separate unit and also with the Empire as a whole.

We need both commercial contacts and greater knowledge of the outside world. "We need windows—to let in the outside air and light, the fresh air to revive our trade and commercial life, and light in the form of wider knowledge to ennoble our national character."

Bander Snatches

Alice was loafing. She sat slumped in a chair with a book, but gazed vacantly in front of her, apparently thinking of nothing in particular, as Freshettes will. The dear little thing was musing on the events of the Friday just past when Levana had escorted her various males to the Junior Ban Righ Formal. Of course she was a Freshette, but because she took such an interest in the Journal they let her go to the dance just so that she could write it up, or something.

"My," she said aloud. "Those decorations were nice. Whoever painted those Mickey Mouse pictures on the walls was certainly a bright young feller. And such nice flowers too! I was in an awful lather trying to keep the Red King from rooting up ferns and palm trees all the time. He takes such an interest in Botany you know."

Here Alice paused and smiled to herself like a Freshette sometimes does. Then she went on, in a musing mutter: "And I thought I'd die when he tried to attack one of the orchestra leaders for playing that "Goofus" thing. But the crowning touch was when he said to me in a loud scream, and right in front of the Duchess too, "Say now, don't everyone just look as if they were on their best behaviour for this one night and it's bein' an awful strain?" I certainly am glad the Mock Turtle wasn't there—he'd have disapproved of the whole thing so, and it was such a nice party. I wish I'd gone to the B. W. & F. meet on Saturday!

New York (UP)—A report on what every girl should know before entering college was made public to-day by Dr. Eugenie Leonard of Columbian University on the basis of a questionnaire delving into the private lives of 203 freshman women at Syracuse.

Major points brought out in the questionnaire were: that she be disillusioned about life, learn how to drink, dance, smoke and neck, and "what it is like," how to act with drunken men.

To the question, "have you ever been in love?" 62 answered no, 21 answered once, and 43 said twice. Fifty-six stated "many times." One co-ed added the comment, "a girl should be trained to have a mind of her own so that she will be able to solve such problems as behaving with a man in a taxi."

Dr. Vlastos Preached At Chalmers' Church

"Philosophy and Religion," was the subject of a sermon preached by Dr. Gregory Vlastos of the Philosophy Department, in Chalmers' Church on Sunday evening. This is the first of a series of sermons to be given by various prominent men on successive Sunday evenings.

Dr. Vlastos began his sermon by defining Philosophy, in his own exposition of the subject, as the Art of Living. Reaffirming the fact that everyone has a philosophy, whether he is aware of it or not. Dr. Vlastos proceeded to outline the relationship between Philosophy and Religion and maintained that one was not an apology for the other.

Nothing To Stop Flow Of Immigrants Says Massey

"continually conscious of the curious position of Canada in the world which enables us as Canadians at one moment to say 'we North Americans' and at the next to say 'we British'. It is quite obvious that this circumstance gives us frequent opportunity to be of great use in the sphere of international relations."

Alluding to the Ottawa Trade Agreements I asked Mr. Massey if he did not agree that there had been a good deal of ill considered comment, favorable to the pacts, both in the press and elsewhere, which seemed to proceed rather from a desire for reprisals against other nations than from a true spirit of fair play in international commercial competition. Mr. Massey concurred in declaring "that interpretation of the treaties and of trade generally wherever it prevails is unfortunate, just as the use of trade arrangements as weapons is unfortunate. We don't want to use them as a stick to beat somebody else" he concluded.

In a final word concerning sentiment in international economic relations Mr. Massey agreed that its value has been over-emphasized. "Such exaggeration incurs the risk of hypocrisy," he stated, "and sometimes leads to grave misunderstandings."

and tickets and programs will be mailed shortly thereafter.

An unusual lighting effect is being arranged by experienced electricians. From past performances it has been realized that proper lighting is of importance in securing the best results of any scheme of decorations. An expert in this field will be in charge of the lights throughout the whole evening and a great deal is expected of him. The new gym. has been completely wired for the occasion so that no breaks are expected. It is rumoured that the Arts Committeemen intend to apply for the degree of B.Sc. as a result of the knowledge of electricity they have gathered in the last week.

The favours are something new. Traditionally, their exact nature is not being divulged, but Mel Halpenny has stated that they will be useful as well as serving as a novelty. They will be fitting souvenirs of the 1933 Arts At Home. The Arts crest is being engraved on the articles.

The suppers are being looked after by those responsible for the exceptionally high quality food served at the Memorial Union. A trained staff has been instructed to see that all of the supper numbers will run off smoothly. Place cards will be found at the supper tables and a pleasing intermission in a night of dancing is assured.

Reserved tickets should be taken up promptly. The committee can be reached any night this week in the old gym. or at their respective 'phone numbers during the day. The list of committee members is as follows: Bob Johnston, 3126-F; Walt Horn, 4194; Art Hall, 1896-J; Stu. Major, 1956-M; Chuck O'Neil, 149-M; Ken Heath, 1896-J; Roy Sharpe, 477-F; Max Rapoport, 1035-W; and Convener Halpenny, 3414.

Graduates' Club To Resume Meetings Next Wednesday

The Gradnates' Club will resume its bi-monthly meetings next Wednesday, January 25th, at eight o'clock sharp in the club room of the Engineering Society, situated in the rear of the Technical Supplies building. The leader of the discussion group will be the Rev. S. M. Gilmour of Theology. This affords an excellent chance for the members to clear up any little problems pertaining to religion.

It is hoped that a large attendance will continue to feature the meetings. All graduates connected with the University are cordially invited to be on hand to-morrow night.

Campus and Gym

Interyear Hockey will see the final game for this year, when Levana '34 meet Levana '35 for the title. The game will be played this afternoon at one o'clock.

The Intercollegiate Hockey team is practicing hard for their initial game with Varsity which will be played here on the 4th of February. They have been playing a series of games with University Year teams and have a game with Meds. '35 Scheduled for Thusaday, Jan. 26th, at one o'clock.

The Intercollegiate Basketball team is also preparing for their Intercollegiate series. A game has been arranged with Belleville C. I. for Wednesday, Jan. 25th, at 7.45 p.m. in the New Gymnasium. The girls have been practicing faithfully and a well-trained team will face the Collegiate aggregation.

Good Track Conditions Assured For Jockey Meet

The mid-winter meet of the Arts Society Jockey Club will be held this afternoon in the Arts Club Room following the meeting of the society. That most prominent year, Arts '34, have their horses primed on a diet of hot dogs and cider, these will also be fed to the jockeys and to all the horse racing fans of the society.

When cornered yesterday afternoon, official starter John Parker, stated that all the horses had shown remarkable speed in their pre-race trials and he anticipated some close finishes.

Silk hats are not essential, it is learned, but pockets should be well-lined.

Civils Club Heard Two Seniors At Last Meeting

The fourth meeting of the Civils Club held in Carruthers Hall recently was addressed by two members of the senior class —Doug Noy and Ted Hallet. Mr. Noy spoke on "Fort Churchill and the Hudson Bay Railway," tracing the history of the project from the first charter issued to the "Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railway" in the latter part of the last century, to the completion of the present Hudson's Bay Railway. After describing the various handicaps, natural, social and parliamentary which were overcome, Mr. Noy discussed a few of the economic considerations which will govern the success or failure of the project.

Ted Hallet's choice of subject was exceedingly fortunate in that he was able to describe it from the viewpoint of an overworked shipping-clerk as well as from that of an engineering student. According to Mr. Hallet, the system of signalling in vogue among the operators of the paper-machines would do credit to the R.C.C.S., though it is especially effective over short distances.

The speaker lamented the lack of appreciation among the average man for the marvels of Canada's third largest industry, and stated that it was only under the most exceptional circumstances that anyone gave a thought to one of the greatest conveniences of modern times.

Arts Swimmers Amass Majority Of Points In Interfaculty Contest

Skilled Exhibition Of Aquatic Experts Thrilled Spectators

Before a packed house at Queen's natatorium, the mermen of Queen's University, Albert College, Kingston and Belleville Y.M.C.A.'s, and two Tricolor mermaids put on a highly entertaining swimming and diving display.

In the Interfaculty events, the Arts team copped the honors with 30 points, Science came second with 12 and Medicine were third with 9.

In the senior competition between Albert College, Kingston and Belleville Y.M.C.A.'s, Albert College scored 26 points with Kingston Y. second with 24 points and Belleville Y. securing a lone marker.

The first three events were put on by the Junior class of the local Y. The novel pigeon race made a big hit with fans; about twenty youngsters were seated along the side of the tank and at the word "go" they stood up, dove in and swam to the far side to take up a seated position. This was repeated until all but the best two were eliminated — and these two kids were so evenly matched that they tied twice. Eric Trueman became Junior champ by taking the 50 yd. free style and 25 yd. back stroke. Tom Turner won the Senior 50 yd. breast, while the Senior 50 yd. back was won by Waring of Albert College.

The first Interfaculty event was the 50 yd. free style which was won by Walter Perry of Arts with Jack Watts of Science a very close second.

The diving competition was next. Tony Forsberg snared the only first for Medicine with 309 points. Clarke Ross of Arts was second with 304 while Southern came third with 289.

Albert College won the Senior 200 yd. relay in 1.58 3-5 minutes with Kingston Y. in second place.

In the Interfaculty 200 yds. breast stroke event, Almquist of Science nosed out a win over diminutive Fergus O'Connor of Meds in the fast time of 3.15 minutes.

Arts Attendance Not In Effect To-Morrow

A special meeting of the Arts Society yesterday afternoon decided to rescind the motion passed at a previous meeting, providing for Saturday morning classes to be called. The meeting adjourned as soon as this decision had been reached.

In an interview late yesterday evening President Warrington declared that as a result of consultation with Dean Matheson he was able to make the following official statement: "Classes will be held as usual Saturday morning but attendance will not be recorded and no new work will be given by the instructors."

Contemporary Short Story Is Discussed

English Club Meeting Hears Mrs. E. Duthie

"The most outstanding efforts in the modern short story are to be found not in the popular magazines, but in semi-professional magazines of Europe and America devoted to the encouragement of work of creative value," said Mrs. Eric Duthie in addressing the English Club at a meeting Wednesday afternoon.

After a brief sketch of the rise of the short story to its present place and power, Mrs. Duthie, then went on to discuss its contemporary significance. "The best models, she said, are to be found in such periodicals as the New Yorker, The Windsor Magazine, Cosmopolitan, and Saturday Evening Post. Most American stories are mediocre, aiming at easy emotional stimulus or amusements. They are more Chekovs, Poes, and De Maupassants to-day than ever before, Mrs. Duthie affirmed, yet only a few magazines printing this kind of material have been able to survive.

There are a number of periodicals, however, she said, which still carry work of an exceptional nature. Among these may be instanced "Story," published in Spain, but American in character; "This Quarter and Contact." Mrs. Duthie told the club that Story is published by two Americans Whit Burnett and Martha Foley; it accepts stories from all over the world, is printed every second month and costs about fifty cents a copy.

The speaker then referred to E. I. O'Brien and his critical appreciation of the Short Story, carried on for the last eighteen years. Mr. O'Brien publishes English and American Best Story collections annually. In the preface to his 1932 collection he emphasises the value of real live matter: power to hold interest; and artistic presentation of material in portrayal and characterization. Mr. O'Brien's opinion is "that American Short Story writers could teach the English to see their own English scene with a more fundamental and profound simplicity." Some of the best Bri-

Arts Society Holds Tumultuous Meeting

Subject Of Freshman Forced Labour Aired

After rather pointed and vigorous discussion in the business meeting in Room 101 of the New Arts Building on Tuesday last, the Arts Society was entertained in the Club Room by Arts '34.

The number presented at this meeting was somewhat greater than the last meeting. A motion regarding a bill for election expenses was defeated and classes in the Arts Faculty on Saturday morning were called.

A point that brought up considerable discussion, as well as numerous amendments, was in connection with Freshman "forced labor" on the Formal decorations. Freshmen expressed the desire to be patted and treated kindly while there were others of different opinions present. The general feeling, however, was that there should be some efficient body to see that the required men be present on Thursday night. This duty was given to the Vigilance Committee.

Although the meeting threatened to go on indefinitely, the situation was saved by the announcement of Arts '34 that the hot-dogs were getting cold. This was sufficient stimulus to bring the meeting back to earth and adjourn to the Club Room.

Here a minature race-track was set up and the aroma of frankfurters and cider mingled with the hoarse cries of the "bookies." Places "on the rail" were at a premium and the crowd went wild with excitement as the horses came down the home stretch. Three races were run in the course of the meet, and such famous names as Effie, J. P. and Alice were on every tongue.

Another feature of the meet was a draw for a ticket for the Arts At Home, which was won by Ed. Stevens. Although somewhat delayed by the lengthy discussion in the business meeting, the party "went over big."

Assault Is Slated For February 3rd

Arrangements are almost completed for another big assault-at-arms, and the eventful program will be offered on the evening of Feb. 3rd, next Friday night. A strong boxing and wrestling squad from Toronto's West End will make up the opposition, for the fast coming Queen's teams, and many stirring struggles are anticipated, since opponents have at last been secured for Merve Peever and Jack Ewen. The Toronto glove wielders displayed some reluctance, when the names of these two dashing performers were mentioned. However, everything appears to be merry and bright now that both of these boxing luminaries will meet real real opponents, and it behooves them to round themselves into tip-top condition, as some sparkling bouts are in view.

"Chuck" Woolgar, hard-hitting and aggressive Queen's middle weight will also be on the card, against a suitable man. Woolgar has come along in leaps and bounds during the last feew weeks, and great things are expected of the likeable "Chuck", when the inter-collegiate fiuals are run off. Jack Macdonald, the pleasing lightweight who scored a meritorious win over his Ottawa contender at the last Assault will also be on the line-up. MacDonald is coming along in great style and it will take a really good amateur to beat him.

The rapidly improving Jimmy Peters will again take the 175 lb. berth against the Toronto invaders. Jimmy is showing a world of speed and hitting ability, and whoever opposes this young star had better be in the pink of condition, or Jimmy will register an easy victory. The boys are all working hard in preparation for this big test, and it would not be one bit surprising to see on Feb. 3rd one of the most exciting ever held in the annals of the B. W. & F.

The grapplers have settled down to real hard work again. Contests for Henry Hosking, Jimmy Campbell, Carlyle, the strong aggressive middleweight star, and either "Gordie" McMahon, or Johnstone in the Blue And White Senior Basketball Team To Encounter McGill And Queen's Successively

VARSITY

Toronto, Jan. 27.—(C.I.P.)—After four games last week against all four competing teams in the local Big Five League, the University of Toronto senior basketball team has prepared this week to engage the McGill and Queen's quintets on Friday and Saturday nights. The team has in the last three practices displayed wonderful form and stamina after defeating the Riverdale Grads in their last game played Friday night. They have defeated each of the local league teams once, except the St. Catharines Grads, who are in second place in the league standing. The lineup is intact at present, although Caplan, the alternate centre, has had a sore ankle for the past few days, keeping him out of the last game. However, he is fully recov-

QUEEN'S

With hockey schedules well on the way to completion, another branch of sport will occupy the limelight on Saturday when the Varsity team stops off at Kingston for their second game of the Intercollegiate series, and their first with Queen's. The Blue team begin the season with a long jaunt playing McGill in Montreal on Friday evening, and Queen's on their way home.

While Queen's have heard little about the senior team, Manager Jack Finley hints that Varsity is due for a big surprise when they oppose the locals. He states that the Tricolor team is fit and ready for any kind of action they are forced into.

Varsity always arouses plenty of interest here and there will likely

New Gym Changed Into Spacious Egyptian Palace For Arts Formal

"MEL" HALPENNY

Whose persistent work as convener of the Arts At Home is receiving unqualified approval.

Lighting Scheme Is Chosen To Heighten Decorative Effects

If Decorations have anything to do with it (and most of us agree that they have) the Arts Formal will be a brilliant success. The gymnasium has been transformed from the somewhat bleak habitat of boxers and basketball players, to a spacious palace designed after the fashion of the Egyptians. The orchestra pit, the most striking feature, is a blaze of scarlet and silver. Four giant Egyptian mummies, two beside the orchestra and two against the wall, keep a silent watch over the dancers. (We hope they won't watch too closely) . . . The walls are cleverly decorated in bands of scarlet and gold, topped by a design of silver and scarlet against a white background. In the wall opposite the orchestra are emblazoned the letters "Arts '33" in honor of this year's graduating class.

The lighting arrangements have been skilfully executed as to bring out to the best advantage the beauty of the decorations. Particularly effective is the centre-drop light. It is an immense cone-shaped silver spiral and is illuminated at each coil.

Ken Large and his Knights of Sweet Music are almost incomparable as those can testify who have heard them over the radio.

Though it seems remiss to mention eating, in the midst of such splendour, we must not omit to mention that an excellent supper will be served at midnight or thereabouts.

Man Is Descended From Drop Of Jelly

States Dr. J. Stanley Before Miller Club

"There are ample grounds for believing man descended not only from the monkey but from a drop of jelly" stated Dr. J. Stanley of the Biology Department in a lecture given to the Miller Club last Wednesday afternoon in Miller Hall. Dr. Stanley went on to explain that he did not mean man was actually descended from the monkey, but that man and the monkey had a common origin, man progressing one way from this and the monkey in an entirely different direction.

He outlined the changes that the single jelly-like cell undergoes until it finally becomes a full-fledged human being and noted the similarity between its growth and that which develops into lower organisms, by means of diagrams. The only essential difference it seems between a fish and an earthworm is that the fish has gill slits and its internal organs are directly connected with the blood stream. The human embryo also has gill slits and the blood stream is very similar to that of the fish, the frog being an intermediate type between fish and man.

Towards the end of his lecture, Dr. Stanley told that the gill slits of the human embryo slit and fuse to form the upper and lower jaws and from there he went on to draw contrasts between the skull of "Pithecanthropus erectus" (supposed first man) and that of modern man protrudes more diagrammatically how the jaw of modern man is more protruded underneath and as example he exhibited the skull of a modern woman and that of a bear pointing out the low brow on the bear's skull and how well-formed the woman's jaw was—a fact which one is led to believe knowing what "talkers" women knowing what "talkers" women are. The meeting was well attended and besides geologists, many future biologists were "among those present."

Sir R. Falconer Next of Extension Speakers

Sir Robert Falconer, President Emeritus of the University of Toronto will continue the series of extension lectures in Convocation Hall, Monday, Jan. 30th, at 5 p.m., when he speaks on "The Lesser Antilles Revisited."

The name of Sir Robert Falconer has been associated with the higher education for many years. A brilliant University career preluded his later appointment as Principal of the Presbyterian College, Halifax (1904). Sir Robert became President of the University of Toronto in 1907 and filled this position with distinction until his retirement last year.

P. T. Requirement

Education of the body is fairly simple—much less complex than the education of the mind. Development of the body is an early movement—again, much earlier than the development of the mind. Realizing this it is surprising that a University like Queen's, professing to be a liberal centre of education, should cling to the principle of academic credits to force upon a student something for which he can and should hold himself responsible. The Physical Education requirement of the present curriculum should have been discarded long ago.

It is not our purpose or wish to attempt to present a case against physical training as a beneficial exercise and one which in the long run will pay dividends which gold bonds or other monetary investments cannot give or buy. The returns in health and physical well-being are invaluable—but there are many ways of taking one's exercise and none more distasteful than routine P.T. as practised here.

All students entering Queen's have received during their High School careers liberal training of the body. In most of these schools P. T. is a daily requirement. Thus, this is one department of the student's education that has not been neglected. This would seem to eliminate the argument that P.T. exists here for the purpose of developing the student's body—an aim which has already been attended to by the High School curriculum. Furthermore, the greater part of the male students at Queen's work during the summer months and P. T. becomes a rather petty consideration in these cases.

A more satisfactory solution to the problem would be to do away with this well-meaning paternalism and give the students a free hand in the matter of looking after their physical self. It is our opinion that if students were allowed to play basketball, handball, swim or fence instead of the required P. T., the aim of this ruling would be met in as satisfactory manner, and this would serve the added purpose of building material for the college teams. Queen's have lost several Intercollegiate B.A.A.A. titles because of real weakness of the fencers. Why not encourage this excellent sport by turning over the P. T. periods to fencing, a sport which one and all would enjoy?

The abolishing of compulsory Physical Training at Queen's would be a progressive step.

The Arts Society

The great success of the last two meetings of the Arts Society betokens, we hope, a revival of interest among Arts students in the activities of their own organization. It has been little short of truism in the past two or three years to say that the Arts Society is moribund, but thanks to the untiring efforts of this year's Executive it seems as if at length the Society is to be given a renewed lease of life and is to secure stronger support from its members.

It would appear to be a reflection upon the Arts faculty itself if the Society were to fail for lack of interest among its members, while both the Engineering and the Aesculapean Societies continue to enjoy loyal support from the Science and Medical faculties respectively. The recent well attended and entertaining meetings of the Arts Society ought therefore to be a spur to all Arts men to turn out to support their own organization. For "Arts Huzza" to have any real significance it must serve as a rallying cry not merely on the football field or the hockey rink, but in all fields of activity in which Arts students are brought into association.

College Pitfalls

Several times during the course of the college year, especially at those times when they are feeling somewhat depressed, students start to consider whether higher education is after all really worth while, to ask themselves if they are deriving any benefit from their university training, and even to wonder just why they are at college.

This mood may spring from several sources, probably the most important of which is a weariness of the subjects that the student may be taking. Often he may register for a course about which he knows very little; usually what knowledge he has of the course has been obtained from some friend who has taken and liked the subject the year before. Very often it will not appeal to the very different tastes of the younger man; one man's wine may be another man's poison.

Then there are the courses which one takes because of some impelling force; certain subjects are pre-requisites for study in later years; others are compulsory. In this way also the student is made to enroll in a course that he dislikes from the very start. And finally, there are those courses which one takes because from the scanty information about them in the calendar or announcement they sound promising and inviting.

If the classes that he has been attending for several months are dull and uninteresting to him, it is only natural that he will grow tired of them; they will become, for a time, a duty for him to attend, a task for him to perform. The result of all this upon him is harmful to the extreme; he loses all interest in his work, and becomes tired of college class-rooms; the work he should be doing piles up, and after a little time has elapsed, he begins to worry about this undone work. Coming exams loom up as a grim spectre before him, and becoming panicky, he starts to burn the midnight oil, to cram and memorize other people's notes. This hurried studying may be enough to enable him to pass his immediate exams, but he derives no real benefit.

Some few of such students blame themselves; others blame the professors, the college, the subjects, trying to satisfy their own state of mind. It cannot be said, in some cases, that the fault is entirely their own. Some professors wisely expect and anticipate such cases, and sympathetically act accordingly.

Fortunately other courses and outside activities usually rescue the victim before it is too late. By the time April comes along, he will have regained control of himself sufficient to pass his exams; but that does not answer his first problem, the problem of whether he has derived full benefit from his college year.

Graduation—A Pessimistic Outlook

The year 1933 will be a milestone in the careers of many university students. For in the early summer of this year they will cast aside their academic gowns and stand, somewhat hesitatingly, on the threshold of a new and strange life as citizens of the world. Theirs is a discouraging prospect. They will have qualified to assume positions where almost none are offered. They have spent from fifteen to twenty years of their youth preparing for this initiation into manhood and citizenship and a world embroiled in an economic chaos spurns their diligent efforts and offers them nothing in return. The paths of higher education today lead but to manual labor.

There is real tragedy in the failure of university students to secure positions upon graduation. Moreover, this injustice is a dangerous spur to social unrest. Earnestly seeking and finding the fruits of knowledge the student, rewarded with the futility of inactivity, is apt to become a burden, if not a menace, to society. He has labored to achieve something better in life than manual labor and he can hardly be criticized if he is bitter and discontented. Even the most biased antagonist of higher education (and there are many!) will admit the university student, upon graduation, has an ethical and logical right to demand an opportunity of proving his ability. This truism may not be so rigidly applied to the graduate in Arts, who has elected a course that will advance him intellectually along purely cultural lines, although, of late, even this course has become much more practical on this continent. But the professional graduate—the doctor, lawyer, scientist, engineer, architect and teacher—has studied with the definite aim of pursuing one of these professions. His years of specialized work at the university are an apprenticeship and his right to participate in his profession cries out for recognition. The fact that only two of last year's graduating class in Engineering in this University were able to secure positions and that thousands of professional men in Canada alone are unemployed is sufficient testimony that that right is not recognized. The outlook is, illogically enough, even less hopeful for the professional man than for the graduate in Arts because the very lack of specialization in the latter's education makes him more adaptable and widens his fields of activity.

It is true that our present system of education, imperfect as it is, sometimes sends forth graduates lacking in capability. Examinations are no certain test of a man's ability for they are not adapted to the individual. But it is also true that actual ability is becoming of less importance in attaining appointments. Influence and the power of capital all too frequently insinuate themselves as the determining factors. This is the grossest injustice of the present system. A social and economic organization that exhorts a man to enter these difficult fields, that provides him with excellent opportunities to prepare for them, that shares the expense of his education and then permits his talents to lie fallow is eloquently at fault.

State-regulation never gained anything like popular approval in the nineteenth century, but the failure of private enterprise to deal with the present economic situation may lead to its almost universal acceptance in the near future. Twentieth century Democracy, bravely flaunting its banner of Property and Freedom of Enterprise, has drifted into a state of industrial anarchy out of which some force, more potent than editorials, must lead it. There is a pure state of democracy that, in its equality of opportunity, is ideal. The shortcomings of the present state must first be realized and then a conscientious effort made to achieve a better one, though it be Utopia itself.

Whatever it is, it will affect the university as much as any other social institution. In the last few years the university has come to consider itself no longer as isolated but as an entity in society. The State does not recognize any duty towards the university graduate today. It may be compelled to tomorrow—unless present conditions are improved.

Contemporary Short Story Discussed My Mrs. Duthie

tish writers are James Joyce, Liam O'Flaherty, L. A. S. Strong, H. E. Bates, and Mr. H. A. Manhood.

The post-war tendency has been to re-discover the English country side; much attention has been given to preachers, barmaids, Anglican Clergy and spinsters. Mr. Coppard is the chief trafficker in this line, utilizing realistic material cast in an idealistic mould. Mrs. Duthie read "Weep Not My Wanton" to illustrate his method. Aldous Huxley is another intellectual who refuses to be hidebound by tradition. The work of Vita Sackville-West is infused with a mystical strain. The English writers, the club was told, are notable for puckishly intellectual humour; a lovely haze of atmosphere; acute and clever satire. But they need to get away from the effete hand of tradition: there is too much formality in their work.

As for the American Short Story, it has thrown off tradition. Strangely, its earliest exponents were expatriates: Ernest Hemingway and E. E. Cummings. The attitude of literary magazines to new ideas is tolerant. A number of the new literary periodicals which have been established still flourish; Pagany, Midland, Prairie Schooner. The only handicap of the American Short Story is that of youth with all its strength, frankness, and lusty delight in life for its own sake.

The Editor of Contact has voiced some of the fundamental beliefs of modernists when he says: "One is saved from inanity when faced by fact. Language in revealing the character of an object must adopt the truth of the senses and engaging simplicity in characterization." Strength of style is evidenced in semi-intellectual conversation — American idiom giving impressions from the stream of consciousness— the flux and flow of ideas through the mind. Mrs. Duthie read a selection from This Quarter to illustrate this. To show new points of view in the treatment of America's foreign element without the corruption of sentimentality, she referred her hearers to Dorothy Parker's story "The Cradle of Civilization" in the New Yorker.

Concluding, Mrs. Duthie emphasized the need of knowledge, selective skill, patience, power to handle plot and situation, if one is to be a successful Short Story writer. Colloquial language may be used when occasion demands. Morley Callaghan, so far, is the only Canadian who has scaled the heights of Parnassus by publishing in the New Yorker.

A vote of thanks was extended to the speaker and the meeting adjourned for refreshments. John Grabb, the President, intimated that Professor Roy would probably be the guest speaker at the next meeting on Feb. 8th, taking as his subject the modern Novel. Subsequently, an open forum for critical discussion of plays, short stories, and poems will be held, and, at a still later date, Dr. Austin of the Medical Faculty may address the club.

Letters to the Editor

Dear Mr. Editor;—

I have carefully read the satirical poem on "March Hares" offering the opinions of W. McL. and B. W., which was published in Tuesday's issue of the Journal. Allow me, if you please, to reply to it.

It is obvious that these two critics have been so charmed by an opportunity to display their own cleverness as quite to forget the worth of critical honesty.

As they have both been prominent members of the Queen's Dramatic Guild, and in view of the coming dramatic festival in which the latter organization will complete with the Kingston Art and Music Club, their attempt at satire is in poor taste.

It seems inconsistent in the director and co-translator to object to the thin, light plot of "March Hares." Or is one to mourn seriously the loss of Gammer Gurton's precious needle, and rejoice upon its discovery in the buttock of the good Hodge? Were it not for the entertainment value of "Gammer Gurton's Needle," and the acting ability of most of the cast, the obsurdity of the plot combined with the dullness of two expiring acts would have killed the play. It was only because the greater part of the play was amusing, that its success was possible, for its historical importance would have been of little help after the curtain had gone up.

Likewise, it was the entertainment that the audience derived from "March Hares" that made possible its success.

But W. McL. and B.W. seem to have missed all that. How they could have been so dull is strange, since a moderately intelligent audience of Kingstonians, Queen's students, and professors seemed not only to enjoy the play, but to be able to understand what it was all about.

Permit me to explain, for the benefit of these Juvenalian critics, (or should one simply say juvenile?), that the sub-title of "March Hares" was "The Temperamentalists", and that the author wrote it in ridicule of "arty" people.

Perhaps if W. McL. and B. W. had not left at the end of the second act, they might have understood the play a trifle more clearly.

May I add that my respect for W. McL. and B. W. would be considerably higher if they had not been swayed by personal prejudice, and, avoiding personalities in general, had confined their critical attention to the skill with which the actors interpreted their roles.

Sincerely yours,

R. A. BROWNE.

To the Editor.

Dear Sir:

Would it be presuming too much to ask you to grant us a small space in your highly esteemed paper to voice our feelings regarding a very important matter?

With the Science '36 Year Dance looming on the horizon, the matter has been very forcibly presented to ourselves that we know no women. This fact may be attributed to two causes: 1. The efficient manner in which the Sophomores squelched any attempts on our part to acquire these necessary evils, and 2. The A.M.S. having only $987.73 (Queen's Journal, Jan. 20th, 1933) could not afford to give us an informal evening in which to meet Levana as has been the custom heretofore.

As the date draws nearer and we are without females (even Science Freshmen like to go to their own year dance), we shall either have to resort to caveman tactics and take Ban Righ by storm, or import some wayward girls from the highways and byways of Kingston.

Although we realize that the A.M.S. officials are harassed by more important and serious affairs, we hope that they will grant their approval to the above plan or give their undivided attention to such an important matter in the life of a Freshman.

—The Freshman Quartet.

The Editor,
Queen's Journal.

Dear Sir:

I am at present greatly disturbed in mind and I appeal to you or the readers of your valued paper for information.

Within the past week we had those delightful functions known as the Ban Righ At Homes which are unique in the social calendar of the University in that the girls act the role of hosts and invite the gentlemen of their choice to attend. It's that part about the "gentlemen of their choice" that is bothering me. Mr. Editor, do you mean to tell me that any group of girls anywhere would personally chose and entertain as guests that job lot collection of moronish males that assembled in Ban Righ on Wednesday and Friday of last week?

If you see a girl at the Hotel on Saturday night dancing with a fellow who looks as if he might have graduated from Rockwood with honors if they didn't count his appearance against him, you feel sorry for her and think that probably he was the only opportunity that offered and "a girl must dance." But now when an occasion arises where the girl is master of her destiny, so to speak, you would think that she would take advantage of it and invite someone who looked slightly human in a tuxedo. Well sir, they won't do it, it seems. She digs up a gorilla for the Formal who would do excellently as the "Missing Link" if they could prove any connection with the "genus homo."

That tall girl you have seen out with more short men than you thought existed turned up leading by the hand a fellow who must get children's clothes cut down to fit him and who gave the impression when he danced that he was trying to tie the ladys' shoe.

Mixed in with the bohunks from Cobalt and the backwoodsmen from Madoc were quite a few of those nice boys who tore themselves away from their tatting and appeared with giggle, lisp, boutonniere and all.

Please tell me, Mr. Editor, that it can not be true that the feminine members of our University have just no taste at all. What is behind this?

Yours,

"Bewildered."

INDIANA UNIVERSITY — There is one class on the campus that students never cut. It is a class in English, organized for foreign students who desire to learn to speak English.

The Judge: And why do you think I should be lenient with you? Is this your first offence?

The Prisoner: No, your honor, but it's my lawyer's first case.

Co-Ed Can Live On One Quarter Per Diem

New York.—A girl can live on twenty-four cents a day in this teeming metropolis, while attending graduate studies in the University, according to the diary of a young lady who lost her intimate book of records in the Main Library recently. On one of her extravagant sprees, the girl spent fifty cents for food, according to the attendant at the Library desk who found the volume.

Breakfast costs her on the average six cents, while lunch is seldom more than eight. In general, the grad student lays out the sum of ten cents for dinner. Of course, she only eats buns and milk in the morning, but for six cents she thinks it worth while. She has confidence in her ability to economize, the diary disclosed.

The young lady is a resident of Brooklyn, but lives in a dormitory and seems to think that the eating-places around the Campus are unusual for their cheap rates. Grapefruit and buns are her favorite dishes.

People often come to the same desk in the Library, now famous for its discovery of the diary, and ask the attendants to write papers, look up bibliographies and do the menial labor necessary to pass a graduate course or seminar. Others call for books, walk away and never come back for them. At the end of the day, about ten or twelve tomes are still uncalled for.

Innumerable people ask directions around the city, ask where the Main Library is, and hunt for the catalogue index which totally encloses the room. The general public often tries to borrow books and are disgruntled when they are told the library service is for Columbia students only.

Foreigners are daily visitors to the Library, but since most of them speak either French or German they are likely to be understood. Some native Americans, when asked their names, give the titles of the books they want. For instance, when the attendant says: "Your name please? the reply is: "Hayes History of Europe," or something similar.—McGill Daily.

REPLY TO CRITICS

If the critics of drama who burst into song
About the play "March Hares" found everything wrong
It's queer that they wasted their valuable time
Comprising such clever invective in rime
On a subject so utterly worthless and light
When they might have more fruitfully put in the night
The Bible has said that by bread not alone
Shall mankind exist but some jam to atone
For the dulness of wholesomness so why did they, pray,
Chisel into the show without paying their way?
To poke fun at people who never intended
That light frothy comedy should be expended
For deep mental stimulus to th' intelligentsia.
They were so overcome these extraordinary gents 'ere
That they quite overlooked they were there for amusement
And used up more energy in clever abusement
Than it takes for their great intellects to inhale
The neurosis of 'Neill or of Wilde when in jail.
We greatly appreciate the interest they've taken
To arouse feebler minds, and attempt to awaken
The deluded unfortunates who seem to have made
A mistake in presuming to even have played
A light story to students of art and the drama
Who are such criterions of speech and of grammar
They sign themselves "I" with two sets of initials.
(The two personality role of officials)
Making mountains of molehills is very inspiring
We commend them most highly for efforts untiring
But permit us to say they remind us of Sutton
Who bought a new shirt 'cause he found an old button.

THE CAMPUSCOPE

On Cancer

In all the theories advanced as to the cause of cancer there has been a stage reached in the research where the theory reverts to a probable causative factor but not a real cause. Probably another theory would not be out of order.

Let us gather a few known facts together as a basis for this theory. Let us first think for a moment about "The Struggle for Existence" that is taking place in all forms of life both plant and animal, and then ask ourselves where this determination to survive originates, from whence is the desire and the driving force? Why is the main object of life to reproduce and survive and what has nature done during the ages to guarantee that we shall succeed in the struggle? To be born is a start in life but for us to be of any further use in the struggle several things must happen. We must grow up for one thing. Now we know that we have produced from the Anterior Pituitary a hormone that regulates this part of the procedure. When growth is complete we require the power to reproduce and the full development of the necessary organs. We also know that through hormone co-operation at the proper time we have the power and organs provided. All very well so far but the struggle does not end here. After our reproductive period has passed our usefulness is not over yet, we are still required to live as protection and support for our offspring and themarry and reproduce would we desire to live still remains. In the meantime other changes have been going on in our bodies namely destruction and replacement of cells. What causes the replacement of these cells to take place? Suppose we say that this process is also under hormone control. Now as age creeps on destruction is more rapid and therefore there is a greater need for this regenerative hormone. Supposing there is a shortage of the hormone might we not expect certain cells to proliferate in an endeavour to supply the demand? Do we not get something of this sort taking place in the thyroid when there is a shortage of thyroxin. Could not this theory be reasonably advanced as a cause for malignant growths? Let us take a few examples. First let us consider Age—

Cancer is more prevalent during the declining years of life and during this period there is a greater need of stimulation of repair, it varies in different organs and in different individuals and there might be a shortage of this regenerative hormone which would account for the sudden proliferation of certain cells in certain organs of certain individuals.

Secondly—Heredity—

Some individuals inherit a strong constitution — others inherit weak organs or the whole individual may be, shall we say, more or less fragile, easily broken up and therefore a great need for repair aud replacement and an excessive demand for this stimulating regenerative hormone. When two such fragile persons marry and reproduce would we not expect that there would be a shortage of this hormone and a resultant tumour or malignant growth.

Thirdly—Sex—

We find the female sex slightly more susceptible to cancer than the male but we also find that in the female it is the organs of reproduction that are the most frequently affected. Now these organs pass through very strenuous periods, often with great destruction and subsequent need for repair which may leave the organ short of the hormone; this shortage might stimulate certain cells to greater effort with uncontrolled proliferation.

Fourthly—Chronic irritation — Here we have a certain amount of destruction taking place, the destruction may not be very apparent as repair may be keeping pace but all the time there is the demand for the stimulating effect of the hormone, with the result that there is a shortage and a chronic ulcer may become malignant.

Whether the hormone, if any, will be isolated from tumour cells or from other cells in the body it remains to be determined but it is known that humour juice will stimulate multiplication of other cells. Why not say that this is the result of hormone stimulation. With this in mind we might direct research work towards a definite goal.

Thus a Neoplasm may be a manifestation of an endeavour on the part of certain cells to prolong life although by getting out of control they defeat their own purpose.

John Nelles.

'Daily Kansan Editorial' Raps Ostentatious Drunk

The motto of one type of student who is a decided campus pest seems to be "It's smart to be drunk." This person is never satisfied just to drink his liquor; in fact that isn't how he gets his fun out of it. His pleasure lies in telling everybody whom he meets, "Boy, I'm lousy drunk." "Man, am I tight!" He feigns more unsteadiness than he really need, too, for the more he reels, and still keeps on his feet, the more esteem he merits from those who, like him, think it's darn hot stuff to be a "drinking man."

One sees an awful lot of this pest, not necessarily because the drinking type is so prevalent on the campus, but because this type always displays himself in public. Drinking alone in his room would be absolutely unthinkable, for there who could see him? And being seen in the zeneth of the college toper's ambitions.

For the sweetest praise to his ears comes when someone mentions his name and says " . . . can really hold his liquor." If they only knew how hard it was sometimes!

Belleville Girls Defeat Levana Basketball Team

In a very close game on Wednesday, Queen's Senior Basketball team lost to Belleville Collegiate Institute by a score of 17-16. Good shooting gave Queen's a number of points, but Belleville's passing, particularly in the first part of the game, was noticeably quick, and resulted in a score of 13-10 in their favor at half-time.

In the second half, Queen's improved guarding and passing, and the well-timed shotting of Doreen Kenny and Bird Yuill brought the score to 16-15 in Queen's favor. Belleville made a asket in the last three minutes, resulting in the final score of 17-16.

Line-ups:

Belleville — E. Moncrieff, A. Gartley, E. May, A. Crufe, M. McLeave, S. Stillman, E. Blaker, M. Merrick.

Queen's—D. Kenny, E. Rickard, H. Rice, B. Yuill, J. Tett, R. Fishleigh, K. Wayling, M. McGinnis, D. Napthali, I. Galbraith.

Levana Swimming Meet

Plans for a Levana Inter-year swimming meet are being discussed and as there is a great deal of enthusiasm for such an event, Miss Murphy would like to get in touch with girls who would be interested. Events will probably include different style races, simple diving contests, and one amusing race. It is also very likely that those daring co-ed divers, Jean Nelson and Elizabeth Cameron would give an exhibition of breath-taking dives, and that certain methods of life-saving work would also be demonstrated. Girls who are interested are asked to see Miss Murphy or Marion Hayes.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Dear Ye Ed.:

I was pleased to note in your columns an item from "A Queen's Democrat"—but would be more so if there were about three hundred or so more in the Faculty. A few more gentlemen of that particular political calling are necessary if the Faculty is to remain worthy of its name.

This is neither the time nor place for half way measures or arbitration. The normal members of the Aesculapian Society must act now—not next year, if they wish to retain the government of that Society. In a year meeting, one of the brethren sorely tried the credulity of the writer at least by saying that the Fraternity had no intention of interfering in campus politics. Why, then, a Fraternity? It is neither scholastic, athletic, religious, regional nor social—its members' ages vary from venerable and bespectacled middle age to pink cheeked, squalling youth. Among its members are total abstainers, bibbers, Grits, Tories, and one or two Progressives. It promotes no charities, feeds no needy poor, equips no beds in any hospitals and offers no scholarships. So what in the name of human reason DOES it intend to do? To one even of my limited intelligence there is but one answer; it intends to be Boss—and unless quick, concerted action is taken, the graft will be on.

We of the Faculty of Medicine at Queen's have a high tradition to uphold. Go out into the fields of practice and see how many former graduates, how many members of the Alumnae Society would want our Constitution so altered. I think the number would be small. At the year meeting previously mentioned, another Fraternity brother deplored the ill-feeling that had arisen in the Year—much as the Bull might apologize to the proprietor of the china shop. The hard feeling is there, all right. The advocated policy of "Kiss and make up" wont lessen it. It would be madness were we to let slip the ground we have gained, so before more of our members become enamoured of the shiny pin, act!

Yours, etc.,
"CICERO."

A FAREWELL TO ARMS
with
Helen Hayes, Gary Cooper, and Adolphe Menjou

Admirers of the Hemingway novel may be dissatisfied with the screen version of "A Farewell to Arms. Those on the other side of the river will, perhaps, prefer the talkies.

While the producers have been fair, on the whole, to Mr. Hemingway, they deemed it politic to camouflage the Italian retreat, to soften Hemingway's sometimes naive brutality, and to remove some of the jerkiness of his staccato dialogue. With these exceptions, there is a close enough parallel between novel and screen. If the talkie is not a carbon copy of the original plot, neither is it a distortion.

An American volunteer in the Italian army meets an English nurse. But it is not the war, background of the story, which claims our interest or theirs. They live together and find their mutual passion the only enduring, frank, and satisfactory element in the chaos and hypocrisy that surrounds them. This, briefly, is the plot. The conclusion of the film when the hero lifts the dead heroine in his arms and faces an open window through which comes the ringing of Armistice bells, is certainly not Hemingway.

Helen Hayes is convincing as the English nurse. Her acting deserves comment, certainly, although she has infused a Barriesque quality into the character of Catherine Barclay which is not present in Hemingway's candid, finely sexed, intelligent heroine. Gary Cooper has never satisfied the exigencies of any part so well as he has in the rôle of Frederic Henry, the American volunteer and deserter. A—.

AT THE TIVOLI

THE GOLDEN WEST
with George O'Brien

Feuds of old southern families, galloping horsemen, great western prairies and yipping Indians go to make up this picture that is distinctly reminiscent of the good old days when Tom Mix and Buck Jones were the heroes of the cinema—just a western thriller, oh hum. As a serious film it is pretty terrible, but if one looks upon it as a farce he can laugh hilariously at over-acted dignity of the southern gentlemen, at a hero practically immune from death, and at Indians who somehow do not act as Indians should.

An exceptionally good "bouncing-ball" cartoon deserves an A.

Book Chats

By R.M.

Mrs. Eric Duthie's interesting talk on the contemporary short story Wednesday has given me much food for thought. By indicating where the best stories are to be found, Mrs. Duthie has paved the way for the development of critical appreciation in this field that is sadly in need to-day. The ordinary, willy-nilly acceptance of the trash printed in weeklies of 2,000,00 circulation makes for decadence and intellectual stagnation.

"Our American Short Story has degenerated because it has not felt criticism," says Henry S. Canby in Definitions (second series). How true that is! A good literature cannot be developed "unless there is somewhere an intelligent critical attitude against which a writer can measure himself." This necessitates the raising of popular standards. Yet sceptics say that human nature cannot be changed, that you must give the public what it wants, and that there is no hope of educating the great mass of the public to appreciate art. By all means give the public what it wants, but presented in an artistic manner, appealing to the simple emotions, and treating of little commonplace, significant incidents. Is this what popular stories do? No!' Convention cannot be disregarded. Editorial precepts must be adhered to. A description of material available to a certain magazine would run something like this: short stories should be not over 4,000 words, should dwell on sophisticated upper-class characters (with which the 'get-rich quick' ideas of all immigrant Americans are associated), should pique the blasé with racy accounts of Don Juans and 'go-getters.' If you don't believe me take a look at some of the McFadden publications which have the largest newsstand circulation in the world.

If it were not for the reassuring remarks of Edward J. O'Brien in the Introduction to Best Short Stories of 1932, one would feel like giving up hope and admitting that popular taste cannot be elevated to a higher plane. But Mr. O'Brien states that the smug complacency of Americans (and Canadians) received a severe jolt in 1930. Since then the short story has been characterized by a more mature artistic treatment; it has tempered itself to the rhythm of real life, as in Sand, a story of the sand-blown wastes of the U.S.; it has breathed poignant drama into a hat in The Red Hat by Moreley Callaghan.

This tendency is characteristic of the day, when honest scepticism pervades the air we breathe. Like the man from Missouri, people have to be shown before they will accept every new panacea; yet they don't blindly adhere to established institutions merely because their fathers and forefathers believed in them. And in the field of literature the same thing holds true. It may be that this envisages a return to the fundamental values of life, to a warmer humanity (a sentimentality if you like), but nevertheless, a firmer foundation upon which to build a worthwhile literary superstructure.

We recommend: Letters of Emily Dickinson, Death and Taxes (poems), by Dorothy Parker; The Burning Bush, by Sigfrid Undset.

In One Ear

We have just received an earful about a co-ed who proposed that an S.C.A. women's discussion group devote a session to "blind dates." It seems that the boys scan the directory and just naturally stop when they get to her monicker. The dear thing gets three or four blind calls per week.

What's more several others were right with her in wanting to a discussion on "blind dates."

Poor dears, they must be all in the dark on the subject. Oh! Oh!

Juniors Win Third Game In Succession

Queen's Juniors captured grottp honours when they defeated Kingston Frontenacs 3-1 in an evenly contested game. It was the Students' third successive triumph, and it was well earned.

Led by "Johnny" Wing, fast skating centre ice star Queen's came frum behind to leave no doubt as to which was the better team. Wing was the best man on the ice, and besides tallying two pretty goals was a constant worry to the Kingston puck carriers and repeatedly broke up their plays in the centre ice zone. Christie, McQuaig and Smith also played effective hockey for the Tricolor, while Guy and Gordon were the best performers for Kingston.

Before the start of hostilities the lights of the Arena were dimmed while the teams and fans stood at attention and a bugler sounded Last Post in memory of George Van Hurne—member of the O.H.A. executive and former stellar defence player on Kingston teams — who died recently.

Both squads started slowly, the checking being of the closest variety, while there were few real scoring chances in the early moments and most of the shots were from outside the blue line. After 13 minutes of play Guy tallied for Kingston, when he slipped down right wing and blazed a hot drive into the corner of the net. It was a nice effort and James had no chance to save. There were no penalities during the first session.

Shortly after the commencement of the second period, Kingston drew two penalties in rapid succession, but the Students were not able to capitalize. About the half way mark Queen's attack became more organized and Sharpe was forced to use everything but his head to keep his cage clear. Finally after a scramble in front of the Kingston net Brydon got the equalizer. The Collegians continued to press, and shortly Wing picked up a loose puck at centre, walked calmly through the urban defence, pulled Sharpe out of the net and nonchalantly hove the disc over the line. It was a smooth, well executed play and the prettiest of the night.

The final frame was prolnctive of the best hockey of the evening, and enough spills and wood chopping for the whole contest. Guy worked his way through for two close-in tries on the Queen's net, but James saved sensationally on each occasion. With ten minutes left to play Wing counted his second goal and the last of the game. He sped down alone to waft the puck through a small opening between Sharp and the post. With 5 minutes to go Kingston sent every man up, but Queen's played strong defensive hockey to hold the two goal lead.

Queen's Basketball Squad Ready To Meet Varsity

he more than usual created this season because of the presence at Varsity of Warren Stevens. This lad made a big hit at the Toronto school with his rugby coaching and the Blue fans are hoping for a second title in basketball.

The Queen's team will consist of a few veterans, and some newcomers to the ranks of intercollegiate basketball. This should result in a nicely balanced team, and as they will be ably supported by capable alternates, a victory is not unlikely.

W. Newman, of final year Science, will occupy the centre position and the way he has been going in practice, demonstrates that he will be a hard man to stop. While playing his first year in the big tent, he promises to make good.

W. McMahon, a Science Frosh, is a product of K.C.I., and is making the senior team because of outstanding ability. A good shot and fast traveller, he should be difficult to keep off the score sheet. He will shine at right forward.

Ted Hallett is too well known to Queen's fans to require any comment. He played Intercollegiate Rugby two years ago at outside wing, and was a member of last year's Intercollegiate Basketball squad. Varsity will need a snappy defence to keep him in check.

Two of the veterans of the squad will team up on the defence. Harry McLaughlin at right guard, and Don Bews at left guard, this pair aggregate ten years of Intercollegiate basketball, six for Harry and four for Don. They have maintained an envions record for clean hard playing, and the defence is well looked after while they are on their game. Don is also Captain of the team.

The team is not weakened by alternates. D. Rook, of second year Meds., comes from U.T.S., and was hailed as one of the best prospects in years. He will get a big test on Saturday, but should come through nicely. Howie Carter, is beginning his last intercollegiate series for Queen's, for when the basketball togs are stowed away Huwie will begin to think of his M.D. degree awaiting him in May. He has played splendid basketball for Queen's in years past and will be in there Saturday with his usual high class brand. S. Brown of final year Arts, is on the team because of sterling performances for the past three years with Queen's seconds. He has proven his worth in many games and is expected to have his best season.

Saturday will find the team ready to go and with no excuses to offer. It promises to be a tough game.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY—The Athletic Association has enought football equipment to completely outfit six hundred men.

SPORTS SLANTS

What a basketball feast tomorrow evening. Three games and each of them stellar attractions. While the main performance will be staged by Queen's and Varsity, the other two struggles should be worth while viewing. The hint seems to be "get a seat early."

* * * * * *

Credit the Junior hockey team with all kinds of grit. They had no easy time downing Frontenacs, but showed plainly that they were much superior.

* * * * * *

Warren Stevens will be looking for another championship in basketball. May the Tricolor put a big crimp in his winning ways.

* * * * * *

Once again a swimming meet has gone over big. There was a huge crowd on hand and didn't they like it. The students cussed a bit because their books were not honored, but the authorities say it just cannot be done on account of expenses. If you don't like that reason, write the editor a letter about it. He likes them.

* * * * * *

Isn't our Journal getting sex appealing? The pictures of Queen's bathing beauties surely aided in packing them in at the pool.

Sports Views

The Junior and Intermediate Ontario Basketball schedule got off to a start last Saturday with both Queen's teams travelling to Napanee. A large crowd packed the collegiate gym to see the double header and they thrilled to watch the locals defeat the Tricolor Juniors, but groaned when the flashy University Intermediates took their game.

The Junior game was a peppy affair with Queen's trailing at half time by a 11 to 9 score, and at full time by a 24 to 16 score. Simmons, Mateer and Ward played good basketball for Queen's and the team will undoubtedly turn in a far better performance in their next game with K.C.I. tomorrow night.

The teams lined up as follows:

Queen's—Guards, Hunter and Henley; Centre, Ward; Forwards, Simmons and Mateer. Subs, McDermott, Cohen, Crawford, Rodgers and Austin.

Napanee—Guards, Hart and Callahan; Centre, Howitt; Forwards, Webster and Robinson. Subs, White, Hume, Cowle, Guthrie and Garratt.

Bolstered by the presence of Rose, Elliott and Megill, the Intermediates went about their job in an impressive fashion and were never headed. They played heads up basketball and won, going away by a 42 to 21 score. This team should go far in the hunt for the Intermediate Ontario title.

Queen's — Guards, Rose and Elliott; Centre, Gordon; Forwards, Eby and Megill. Subs, Finley, Baker, Telfer and Booth.

Napanee—Guards, Bentley and Deline; Centre, Black; Forwards, Frink, McDonald. Subs, Brennan, Oliver and Webster.

Referee—M. Kinkley.

All honors go to the fighting team of Juniors that comprises the Tricolor team. They demonstrated that they were much better than the Frontenacs, by scoring 11 goals in the three games played, while Frontenacs could only score 6. While they all played excellent hockey, Johnny Wing proved to be the big threat and his presence made the team a strong contender.

It is uncertain at present whether the Juniors will be asked to play the final game of the series next Monday with Kingston. They captured the group, with the winning of Monday's game and the last battle of the series would not prove interesting.

They will have about a week's rest before being called on for further action, which will likely find them opposing Belleville Juniors. This team is the probable winner of the Belleville, Madoc, Campbellford series and should provide tough opposition for the Tricolor.

The Seniors were unable to fulfill an engagement at Gananoque on Tuesday evening, and that game will likely be left until later in the season. In the meantime they are not letting up one iota in their practising, for they firmly believe that they are every bit as good as Frontenac Seniors. R.M.C. will be their opponents tonight and unless the Cadets have pepped up a lot, they will not prove difficult to overcome. The big games promises to be one week from tonight when Queen's again meet Kingston.

Basketball fans will get their desires amply fulfilled tomorrow, for in addition to the big Varsity-Queen's game, there will be two other cage attractions of more than ordinary interest. The first will bring together Queen's Juniors and K.C.V.I. youngsters and the fans will get a chance to look over the Tricolor entry in the Junior O.B.A.

The second game will be an Intercollegiate Senior "B" fixture featuring R.M.C. and McMaster University of Hamilton. This game should be an attraction, because the winner of the Senior Intercollegiate will most likely be challenged by the Senior "B" winner which will be R.M.C., McMaster or Ontario Agricultural College of Guelph.

Varsity Basketball Team Plays McGill and Queen's

ered and the nine players who make the trip will be in fine fettle for the intercollegiate openers. The line-up will consist of the nine players allowed and will be chosen in the next few days from the following squad: Allison, Collins, Ford, Gold, Sniderman, Wood, Caplan, Wagman, Hewer, Riggs, Levy and Newman.

Ian Allison is in post graduate work and is playing for the first time under Toronto colours. He hails from Windsor, where he played for Assumption College, and ranks as one of the most spectacular and brilliant forwards in the Canadian game. Flanking him is Hal Collins, a Varsity veteran, who was out last year through ineligibility. He is another smart performer, played last year with St. Catharines Grads, and works effectively with Allison making a combination with Ford which is hard to beat. Ken Ford stepped up to senior ranks this year from the interfaculty champions and this year won the intercollegiate high jump. His height is a big advantage and his improvement in ability and form has been rapid.

Phil Gold and Harold Sniderman form the regular rear guard. Sniderman is a veteran of three years and this season is playing better than ever before. His defensive tactics are noted for keeping point-getters off the score sheet. He is also the second rating scorer on the Toronto team which accounts for his versatility both defensively and offensively. Gold moved up from the junior team to fill the place left by MacCallum early in the season when his health demanded attention. Gold's performances have been almost phenomenal and his strides in improvement have drawn the attention of all cage critics of Toronto and District. Don Wood, who is the veteran of the most experience has just staged a comeback to his old time form after a slow start this season due to the need of his services in football. With six weeks' conditioning to catch up on he has just hit his stride in the last two games, playing at guard in place of Gold who has been off with fouls early in the game. His generalship is a steadying influence on the team and his knowledge of the game and its finer points is greater than the average amateur's. Caplan is playing his first year on the team and alternates at centre and guard. He is a power defensively, but has yet to break into the list of high scorers.

Wagman is a diminutive star who is another first year player, coming from the Central Y.M.C.A. juniors of last year. He is a smart player and works well when alternating for Allison. Hewer alternates at centre and guard. He comes from O.A.C. where he played regular centre for two years. He was at the top of his stride at the first of the season and during the American tour, but has slowed up of late and has lost some of his former effectiveness. Riggs, who was captain last year has not been seen much on the line-up since the tour due to the pressure of studies and may give way to a newer player who needs the experience. However his services are always useful to advantage when he is in the game for his speed and ball-handling usually net several baskets. Levy is another newcomer and hails from the Lizzies' camp. His inexperience has kept him from the regular line-up, but he is a deadly shot and may be included on the intercollegiate squad with Newman who has played three years with the intermediates, and may be due for a step also.

The team this year has shown more pep and fight than any outfit representing Varsity in the last three years and with this determination and their favourable record to date they ought to go far in the struggle for the intercollegiate basketball title. Under the coaching staff of Coach McCutcheon, Warren Stevens and Lew Hayman, which is no doubt the best in the country, they have developed a very scientific style of play, knowledge of which has been increased by their tour of the States this year where they met and made a creditable showing against some of the best teams in the East.

S. C. M. Shrapnel

At certain times of the year, particularly in January and February, the shop windows are full of all sorts of dress goods at reduced prices. Beautifully printed little cards look out at us as we stand looking into the window, and they say something like this: "Reduced in price; our Annual Clearance Sale is on; we must get rid of these goods."

The average student coming to college for the first time, has at least one fixed opinion of life, inasmuch as he thinks that there is very little left to learn. To him a degree is just one rung higher up on the ladder of success, which mounts into the clouds of his day-dreams. But having been exposed a year or two to the professors' mental battering ram, he begins to yield, as any stout wall will in time if the right amount of force is applied. During his second year or so, your average student falls into what is known as 'Sophomore apathy' (a disease prevalent among students of this University); after which time, it is generally supposed that he emerges into a more reasonable and wholesome state of mind.

It would be well if students, like stores, would take an inventory now and then, for the purpose of getting rid of certain old-stock opinions and worn-out prejudices. Why not try it? The year is still in its youth—time is ripe. Write out a personal questionnaire. Here are a few suggestions:

What do I honestly think of religion?

If opposed to it, is it merely because its field is one that I have never ventured to explore?

Am I ashamed to call myself a Christian for fear that others will laugh at me?

There are many more questions that one might ask of oneself. An even better way, however, of finding out where we stand on questions of religion or current topics, is to attend the S.C.M. informal discussion groups. The very fact that others are airing their opinions helps us to form new ideas of our own. If you believe yourself to be a confirmed atheist or an agnostic, come anyway. Your ideas will provide good stimulus for argument.

MUSIC

The Music Club spent two delightful evenings at Dr. Frosts' this week. Wednesday night the program consisted of the Scherzo and Nocturne from Midsummer Night's Dream (Mendelsohnn), the first movement of the Kreutzer Sonata by Beethoven and the Scherzo from his Ninth Symphony. We were also favored by two Minuets played on the violin by Jack Barber, accompanied by Mrs. Tracy. We consider that our Club ought to include these "real life" members as often as we can, besides our programs of recordings. Mr. Barber was enthusiastically received. Dr. Frost had some interesting comments to make on the music. The Scherzo of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, far from being what dance tunes suggest — gay and happy was full of a melancholy almost cynical bitterness. As if Beethoven were saying to an unseen audience "See how clever I am with my elaborate, manipulations of the fugue form, see how I can be so clever yet so full of despair." When Beethoven first conducted his Ninth Symphony (he insisted on it, though he was stone deaf) the conductor of the orchestra stood behind him and bade the orchestra on no account watch Beethoven. Long after the music had ceased, the composer went on conducting till finally the conductor turned him round that he might see the audience applauding—Surely one of the most pathetic scenes from a great but tragic career.

Thursday evening the same program was followed except that Mr. Barber and Mrs. Tracy were unable to play for us. In the near future Principal and Mrs. Fyfe are having the Club at their home to hear Beethoven's Seventh Symphony; other smaller numbers also will be played. This will prove to a fine meeting. We urge all students who love music to take advantage of this very kind invitation.

Dr. Frost gave the Club a warm invitation to come over to his house whenever we wished; we would have complete choice as to what records we should like to play from his splendid library. We shall therefore look forward to some more enjoyable meetings at Dr. Frosts' before the term is out. We wish that Levana would get over their shyness (?) end enjoy the wonderful music we are hearing. And we do wish people would get over the notion that there is anything 'snooty' about us. Come and enjoy yourselves! That's what you're supposed to do when you listen to music.

Arts Men Win Majority Of Points At Aquatic Meet

Summers of Albert College annexed the Senior 50 yd. free style event in 28 4-5 secs., with Jack Watts of Kingston Y. a close second.

"Chink" Anglin of Arts took the 100 yd. free style in the speedy time of 1.04 minutes, with long John Stevenson, also of Arts, right on his heels.

Pesner of Arts thrashed out a fast win in the 50 yd. back stroke to beat Shapera, who was the only other competitor in this event.

The Arts and Science relay team fought a hard duel, with Arts nosing the engineers out in the home stretch. Medicine also ran.

An outstanding performance of the night was that of Jack Watts, "Chappy's" son, who competed not only in 2 Intercollegiate events but also represented the Kingston Y. in 3 others.

As a fitting climax to a colorful sporting event, made even more colorful by the presence of a host of Levana supporters, "Arn" Wright's diving troupe put on a truly wonderful diving exhibition. The cast in his company were Jean Nelson, Elizabeth Cameron, Don McKerracher, Clarke Ross, Tony Forsberg and Ken Southern.

The work of Jean Nelson and Elizabeth Cameron was the highlight of the meet.

Into the classroom of a certain professor who has a reputation for being a wit and a wag strolled one of the numerous campus dogs. When the professor noticed him he said, "Will someone kindly take the animal out." Then looking his class over he said, "After all, we have to draw the line somewhere."

Dr. O. L. Bockstahler Speaks On Goethe

Students of German heard Dr. O. L. Bockstahler deliver a very interesting and instructive lecture on the subject of the Goethe Centennial Anniversary in Germany last summer, which the speaker witnessed.

In the first part of his address Dr. Bockstahler described briefly the elaborate displays of everything that had in any way to do with Goethe and the respect and honour paid to the great poet. He told how everywhere in Germany practically everything that was seen, heard or said was in connection with Goethe.

"The celebration lasted till the latter part of August," said Dr. Bockstahler, "It was especially in Leipzig, Weimar and Frankfort that the displays of the great Goethe were most elaborate. These had a tremendously inspiring effect on the German people, who were very depressed and still felt the sting of disgrace because of their losses of property and prestige as a result of the World War. Thus the literary and intellectual products of Germany during the 18th century, the "Golden Age" of German literature, which were shown, directed the German nation to another side of life which they had neglected. After the World War it was considered that Germany had got a "black eye" from her severe militaristic and agressive policies, but now, as a result of these exhibitions, three million people, among them foreigners from England, France and America, visited the three mentioned cities and recognized another aspect of German activity, which they will no doubt cherish in future years."

Dr. Bockstahler then continued his address with the aid of lantern slides. He showed and described the many places of interest in Leipzig, Jena, Weimar and Frankfurt. He particularly emphasized their connection with and their influence on Goethe, but also gave interesting facts about them in general.

The lecture was much appreciated by all who were present and especially by those who are studying Goethe's life works this year. At the close Dr. Bockstahler was warmly applauded.

Arts Association Meeting

Problems of the illustrator and caricaturist were discussed by Professor Conacher in an address before the Kingston Art Association on Tuesday afternoon. Illustrating his remarks by a succession of instructive and amusing blackboard sketches the speaker explained the essential function of the illustrator, whose first duty is to illustrate his story sympathetically. He also showed how in the work of the caricaturist, exaggeration and invention play a major part. Dr. Conacher exemplified the use of a few rapidly executed lines to suggest pictorially the essentials of an idea.

GRADUATION DINNER

As there will be no Levana Dinner this year, Levana '33 is planning a graduation dinner at the La Salle Hotel. Lists have been posted in Ban Righ Hall and the Arts Building, and all girls who wish to attend are asked to sign their names as soon as possible.

The exact date, or the price of the tickets, have not been decided, but with the co-operation of everyone arrangements may soon be made. Other information may be obtained from Jo Tett and Hilda Landon, Levana '33.

Debate Russian Deal At Meeting Of Union

"Resolved that this government provide the necessary guarantee to make possible the Russian trade pact" was the topic of a debate held recently by the Political and Debating Union.

George Wallace was in the chair and L. Sabbath upheld the government side of the resolution. Arguments came thick and fast and were of a decidedly newsy nature. The session was a bedlam of sound until Mr. Vernon's objection to continued interruptions necessitated a ruling by the speaker that no one interrupt. In spite of vigorous denunciation by Mr. Reid, expert economist, the government appeared to be strong enough to carry this motion until Mr. Gilmour managed to have an amendment carried which took all force out of the original resolution and left the government with a very empty success.

Grads' Club Hears Rev. S. M. Gilmour

"The name of Nero, the 'arch-villian' of biblical ages, can be linked up with names of men in modern history who possessed the same characteristics—I refer to such men as Napoleon and the Kaiser," said Rev. S. M. Gilmour, in speaking to a meeting of the Graduates' Club. This is accomplished by the cryptic method of explaining the various passages in the Bible. Each letter in the Greek alphabet is assigned a number so that a total number may be found for any word. The above mentioned men all possess the same number. Again, the mystic reference to a branch and a comforter in the Old Testament was explained by this same method. They both had the same number as the Messiah.

The most common method of explaining the Testaments is by the use of allegories. The Jews, who were originally a nomadic tribe, accepted the Book of Deuteronomy in 1621 B.C. as their book of law and two centuries later had added four more to it to form the Pentateuch, which has been their code book to the present day. During the time of Plato and his contemporaries the Jews became impressed by the Hellenistic influence. One Jew in particular, Philo by name, set about to show by allegorical means that the Greek philosophers had also drawn their learnings from Moses, the fountain of all wisdom and philosophy, but presented it in their own mythical way. Augustine, and later Wycliffe, found much strength in the use of allegories. The latter showed that the parable of the Good Samaritan, which is usually considered as having just one moral, really exemplified the whole system of Christian Theology. Still others have insisted that the Bible should be taken literally, but they have always specified their own literal meanings.

The very informal meeting was then thrown open for discussion and many problems were advanced and cleared up. Before the meeting was adjourned the Rev. Mr. Gilmour related some of his experiences while studying in Germany, all of which was listened to with keen interest. Insult duels that still exist in a few of the universities over there appealed most to the gathering.

Nurse: Sit down Willie, and amuse your sister. Tell her a story.

Willie: I just told a story to Dad and I can't sit down.

Campus and Gym

Levana '34 and '35 staged a closely fought hockey game on Tuesday afternoon. Since members of the senior team yere generously sprinkled on both sides, the score of 1-1 still stood after a 5 minute overtime period.

Aileen Mason legitimately of Arts '36 but always willing to help, scored '35's lone goal. Margaret McGregor in the nets did some very nice work.

Dot Clemens, Jean Nelson and Margaret Chambers were the stars of Levana '34. Dot and Jean repeatedly tore down the whole length of the ice, but failed to score. Since the goal scored for '34 took place in a mad scramble, the honors are left unsung.

Linenps:

Levana '34—Goal, Lillian Ward, Defence, Dot Clemens and Jean Nelson, Forwards, Ruby Cordy, Jean Stewart, Marg. Chambers. Sub. Carmel Milne.

Levana '35—Goal, Marg. McGregor; Defence, Billie Billings, Marion Paul; Forwards, Jean Cameron, Florena Cramp, Aileen Mason.

In the first interyear basketball game Levana '34 played Levana '33, the former leading at full time with a score of 40-19. The game proved to be highly amusing both to the audience and the players themselves, as members of both teams have practised together for the Intercollegiate team.

Line-ups:

'33—Do Kenny, Fay Kimmins, Gwyneth Gwillim, Jean Taylor, Dot Brooks, Jo. Tett.

'34—Isa Galbraith, Nora McGinnis, Sally Farlinger, Hilda Rice, Eileen Hancock, Margaret Chambers.

Levana '36 showed up very well against Levana '35 in the second Interyear basketball game. The final score was 40-15 for the Freshettes. Evelyn Rickard and Ruth Fishleigh made most of the '36 baskets. The line-up was:

Levana '35—Dorothy Napthali, Helen Paulson, Margaret Biggins, Edith Pense, Claire Johnson, Gretchen Harvey, Marguerite Lemmon and Janet Hamilton.

Levana '36 — Ruth Fishleigh, Grace Turner, Bud Yuill, Kay Wayling, Aileen Mason, Barbara McDonald, Libby Steinbach, June Roth and Evelyn Rickard.

The final Interyear basketball game between Levana '34 and '36 will take place this afternoon at 2 o'clock.

In a practice game yesterday afternoon Meds. '35 defeated Levana hockey team by the score 3-0. Both teams played snappy hockey throughout the game, which was short and speedy. Somersaults and head-on collisions added to the excitement, and Meds '35 worked hard to secure their three points. "How" Hamlin, lightning defence player, kept Margaret McGregor peppered with shots, but the Levana goalie deserves much credit for the low score. As most of the play centred around her. The line-up was:

Levana — Margaret McGregor, goal; Jean Nelson, Dot Clemens, defence; Jean Cameron, Jean Stewart, wings; Marg. Chambers, centre; Eileen Mason, Ruby Cordy and Carmel Milne, subs.

Meds. '35—McCarthy, goal; Teskey, Hamlin, defence; Ross, Johnson, wings; Peever, centre; Glass, Elliott, Asselstine and Connors, subs.

Education Topic Of Interview With Sir. R. Falconer

Sir Robert Falconer Discusses Question Of Popular Interest

By E. H. Gibuour

Yesterday afternoon I was fortunate enough to secure an informal interview with Sir Robert Falconer, President Emeritus of the University of Toronto. I reproduce below my impressions of the conversation I had with him.

"I believe that as soon as the present difficulties are tided over there will be a field of considerable opportunity here for young men emigrating from English Public Schools to Canadian Universities," said Sir Robert in reply to a question of mine regarding the possible field in Canada for the work of such bodies as the Anglo-Canadian Education Committee. "But I consider it to be essential that these young men should get their professional training in Canada." Here I point out that there was a difference of approximately a year between the leaving ages at English and at Canadian schools. Sir Robert was of the opinion that it would be well for such immigrants not to delay beginning their University courses long after they had reached the age of eighteen. "I grow more and more convinced," he said, "that the Canadian University student, particularly in the Faculty of Medicine, needs to begin his course as soon as possible for he has a long way to go before he is finally established. His difficulties are by no means over even when he has graduated."

L. S. R. Delegates Gather In Toronto

Delegates from seventeen branches of the League for Social Reconstruction met at Baldwin House, Toronto, over the week-end. The major problem discussed was affiliation with the co-operative Commonwealth Federation.

Queen's was represented at the Convention.

Professor King Gordon of McGill University urged that identification with a political party on a basis similar to that existing between the Fabian Society and the Labour party in Great Britain, would be an effective stimulus to research and education.

The question of formal affiliation brought forth a diversion of opinion. The aim of the L.S.R. was defined as a desire to carry research in political and economic problems: to make public the information so gained, but not to mingle in politics.

Professor E. Havelock, Varsity, spoke in favour of affiliation. He pointed out that thought was useless unless allied with action.

The question will be put before the various branches.

"Twelfth Night" Goes On Boards To-Morrow With Selected Cast Of Queen's Faculty Players

Basing their interpretation of "Twelfth Night" upon a recent Stratford-on-Avon production of Shakespeare's charming and amusing play, the Faculty Players are presenting this comedy in Convocation Hall during the remainder of this week, as their first public offering of the year.

Shakespeare comedy has an universal appeal for the twentieth century as has been evident by the success of the Stratford-on-Avon Players in both their home and touring productions. Even the modern-dress interpretations of Macbeth and Hamlet have had the effect of turning the theatre-goes to the standard productions of such reputable companies as that of the Memorial Theatre.

The current production of the Faculty Players has been carefully supervised by Professor Roy and the cast includes well-known Faculty members who have had leading roles in former productions. The feminine lead is being taken by Miss Laird. Margaret Fyfe as Viola and Miss Clara Farrell as Maria, the sprightly maid and arch-conspirator will continue the excellence of previous roles. The Medical Faculty is well represented in the production since Drs. Etherington, Maegregor, Orr and Austin have leading roles.

The incidental music which lends such charm to the play is being furnished by an orchestra under the direction of Dr. Tracy. Dr. Macgregor in his role of the Clown sings the whimsical songs, which are so interesting a feature of the play.

The costumes for the play have been designed by Mrs. Goodwin whose talent and originality have been well expressed in the execution of the designs by Mr. Gates.

Changes In West Indies Described In Illustrated Lecture By Sir R. Falconer

Speaker Told Of Voyage Through Lesser Antilles In Convocation Hall Yesterday

"The West Indies are within our purview, if only because of the considerable traffic which we have with them," said Sir. Robert Falconer speaking on "The Lesser Antilles Revisited" yesterday afternoon in Convocation Hall. "In my recent visit to the Antilles I was struck by the great changes which have taken place since my last sojourn there forty-six years ago."

Sir Robert told of having lived in Trinidad as a boy—when his first trip to that island was made in a small Cunard steamer of six hundred and seventy-seven tons. Conditions were considerably trying in these days when outbreaks of malaria and yellow fever were frequent, and a marked contrast to those of the present-day, when one travels on steamers which have every convenience.

The Lesser Antilles are for the most part British possessions. The oldest, Barbados, has been under the rule of Britain since 1625 and is known as "Little England." The island of coral formation is vastly different from the others which are volcanic in origin. All these islands produce great quantities of citrous fruits, sugar, cocoa, and so on. Trinidad grapefruit, St. Kitts sugar cane, Montserrat lines and the Trinidad oil and asphalt are known the world over.

Frequent hurricanes occur among all the islands of the West Indies except Trinidad. Volcanic eruptions are not uncommon and malaria and yellow fever have been the horror of the inhabitants for years. These two diseases, however, are gradually being wiped out along with leprosy which was at one time very prevalent. The great volcano, Mt. Pelée in 1902 destroyed the entire town of St. Pierre and all the shipping in the vicinity was wrecked, with one lone exception.

Careless Carousers Smash Plaster Replica Of Greek Statue Early Last Friday Morning

The successful efforts of the Arts men who were working at the Formal decorations early last Friday morning, were somewhat disturbed when certain rather boisterous persons accidentally smashed a large plaster statute in the main hall of the gymnasium.

The statue was one of a collection of plaster replicas of Greek statues, ornamental details, capitals and pediments, which came from the Royal Military College authorities many years ago, and reposed in the Museum in the old Arts building until recently when the museum material was moved to Miller Hall. Two of these replicas "The Discus-Thrower" and "Apollo" were presented to the A. B. of C. to be repaired and placed in the main hall of the gymnasium, perhaps as a reminder to the B. W. & F. boys of what a young Greek god really looks like.

There were not many witnesses of the occasion and it looked as if the amateur detectives would have to start to work but the person or persons involved ended the sleuthing by surrendering themselves to the mercy of the authorities. Their case will be considered in the special session of the A. M. S. Court, called for Wednesday evening.

Annual Arts Faculty Formal Held In Skilfully Decorated Gymnasium

Merrymakers Agree Formal Was All That Committee Promised

"Here it is Monday," or rather Tuesday—and the Arts Formal is an event of the past. As every one agrees, between yawns, it was a highly successful party, and is something to be remembered in the dim future when one's college days are over.

The gymnasium was decorated after the fashion of the Egyptians, in a color scheme of red and silver. A large fan-shaped canopy, a blaze of scarlet and silver, was arranged over the orchestra platform. Four giant Egyptian mummies, two beside the orchestra pit, and two against the wall, kept a silent watch over the dancers. The walls themselves were covered with red and gold, topped by a design of silver and scarlet against a white background. Under the gallery was emblazoned in colored lights the word "Arts." The skilfully concealed lighting added to the glamour of the decorations. Particularly effective was the centre light which was in the shape of an immense silver coil. At each of its three tiers it was illumined in constantly changing colors of green, blue and red. Sitting out places were arranged in one of the smaller gymnasiums and in the gallery.

Ken Large's orchestra of Montreal did not quite attain the usual high standard. Although their music was on the whole very satisfactory, some of their fox trots were almost breath-taking, while some of their waltzes, on the other hand, were too slow, but such a merry spirit of conviviality prevailed among the guests, that no one minded.

At one o'clock supper was served in one of the smaller gymnasiums. As a souvenir each member of the fair sex was presented with a small whisk with a porcelain figure as a top, and the words "Arts '33" and the Arts crest engraved on it.

The patronesses at the Formal were Mrs. D. McArthur, Mrs. H. L. Tracy, Mrs. W. Mackintosh, Mrs. John Matheson and Miss W Gordon.

Continue Casting For G. B. Shaw Comedy

Castings for "Androcles and the Lion" to be presented by the Dramatic Guild in Convocation Hall on Feb. 17 and 18 have almost been completed the Journal learned Monday. Possibly one Schnitzler play will be included on the bill.

In G. B. Shaw's play Hazel O'Kilman will play Megaera; Scarth Macdonald takes the role of Androcles. The other parts have not been assigned, definitely and several are open to competition. The directorate requests that anyone interested communicate with them.

"Androcles and the Lion" is an uproarious comedy tinctured with Shaw's splenetic genius. To add balance to the entertainment a Schnitzler play requiring three characters may be staged. Walter

Sports Of Primitive Man Needed Today

Dr. W. T. MacClement Spoke To Naturalists

Dr. W. T. MacClement of the Biology Dept. was the speaker at the Thursday meeting of the Natural History Club. His subject was the need of primitive (so-called) sports for civilized man. Lantern slides were used to illustrate Professor MacClement's talk.

Man belongs to the earth and is just another species of animal. In Genesis and in the folk lore of many nations there are myths and tales that tell of the creation of man as a separate entity. These are largely the result of the variety of mankind. People object to the idea that they are descendants of brutes. The extreme opposition to the theory of Evolution taught by Darwin and Huxley is another example of this vanity. Most people would like to believe with the Bishop of London that they were "on the side of the angels." Two thousand years ago the Britons were painted savages, and five thousand years ago all mankind lived under very primitive conditions. Flints and artifacts establish the time that man has been man, runs back 500,000 years.

The development of the human body and mind shows the survival of the animal in man. Teachers must know these survival traits. Climbing, running, etc., are natural to all children, and are the survival of pursuits that enabled early man to become civilized man. Civilization means concentration on one line for long periods at a time. As we are still imperfectly denatured animals. We must have sports and pursuits that do not mean concentration. Fishing is the perfect sport for the tired professor or student. Weariness of mind is an inoxicant that only rest and recreation can overcome. Thus, if one wishes to pass exams in the spring get into some field of sport or recreation.

Tricolor Defeats Toronto Senior Basketball Team

Gymnasium Packed As Tricolor Gained Hard Fought Victory

Amidst a roaring crowd which packed the gymnasium to the rafters on Saturday night, the Queen's Senior Basketball team, in their flashy new golden yellow sweat suits, opened the Senior Intercollegiate series here by scoring a decisive, but closely fought decision over Varsity. Beaten by McGill the night before, the Varsity squad, which is being tutored by Warren Stevens this year, put up a great fight in an effort to pull the game out of the fire in the dying moments, but they just weren't good enough to ward off the determined thrusts of the Queen's outfit, nor could they penetrate the Tricolor defence

Captain Donny Bews was a tower of strength, the crack right guard of the Queen's team steadied the forward line, back-checked with all his persistency and was a consistent scoring threat throughout the game.

Although not a newcomer to senior basketball, "Slush" Newman, playing his first year for the Tricolor was one of the most effective men on the floor. He continuously out-jumped the Varsity centre, who, by the way, must have stood a head taller than "Slush", and was the centre of all the Queen's plays.

Harry McLaughlin played a whale of a game defensively, but was a bit off on his long shots. Towards the end of the game, however, he began to exhibit some of his old-time form when he potted a

Dr. Dyde Discusses Nature Of Religion

Dr. S. W. Dyde led the discussion at a recent meeting of the Theological Society. He chose, "The Nature of Religion" as a subject which is always of interest. The speaker gave Hegel's view, "that in religion we withdraw from the Temporal to the Eternal where we find peace. Dr. Dyde then pointed out that Karl Marx, the follower of Hegel, concluded that such a view made religion "the opiate of the people." This was a natural conclusion for Marx, in the light of his interest. The speaker continued, that philosophy has given up the idea of God as a first cause or a nebulous being in some far distant part of the universe. Yet, he emphasized that Hegel's view cannot be cast aside too easily. It is necessary that we should see a "beyond" in the "thing". That is, everything is something more than it momentarily appears.

Dr. Dyde holds the view, that God is the process of creation which is active at this minute, as well as in the past. Outside of God there is nothing. Therefore, evil is contained in God. But, the process of creation has inherently within it the capacity to be gradually rejecting evil.

The Miller Club

Queen's University is again the recipient of a distinguished honor. While it has not been uncommon for graduates to bring distinction to their Alma Mater as the result of success in research or achievement in other fields of enterprise, the latest "bon mot" comes from the Carnegie Corporation which recently issued a report on Canadian Museums. Through their investigators Sir Henry Miers and S. F. Markham the Carnegie Corporation has singularly honored the University by naming the Miller Museum as one of the outstanding of its kind in Canada.

"Only a dozen museum buildings in Canada are well worthy of the towns in which they are situated" we read in the report. Attention is then directed to the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto, the Miller Building for geology and mineralogy at Queen's University, and a few others in the Dominion.

Kingstonians and more particularly Queen's Alumni and undergraduates should feel proud of their University and the New Miller Building, a recent addition.

Eager to furnish our readers the best within our power to give we sent one of our feature writers to visit the Miller Museum. Elsewhere in this issue you will find his interesting story.

A Course In Writing

It may come as a rather disturbing surprise that the question of illiteracy constitutes a serious problem at Queen's. We have often heard comments made by members of the faculty which reveal that this evil is prevalent here, and it has been one of our many unpleasant discoveries to note this amazing trait among the student body. There seems to be in many cases an unfamiliarity with the rudiments of English Grammar and Composition.

Under any educational system the ability to present ideas written in a clear and concise form plays a large part in the success or failure of the undergraduate. Yet frequently, even in senior years, professors are confronted with papers, which whatever may be their intrinsic value, are handicapped by faulty English and poor presentation. Carelessness, naturally, may account for a large percentage of these fundamental mistakes, but perhaps in the majority of cases lack of elementary knowledge of Grammar and Composition is entirely responsible.

We need not stress here the importance, satisfaction and desirability of knowing one's own language. Economic theories, mathematical solutions, chemical experiments, historical data, foreign languages, and even a knowledge of English authors pale before the importance of being able to speak and write correctly our own language. To mention a knowledge of English authors in the same group with other subjects which we consider unimportant in comparison to the desirability of knowing one's native language may seem contradictory to the contention which we are endeavouring to establish, but this statement will become clearer when we say that, surprising as it may appear, even honor English students are not totally exempt from this illiterate penchant. In several cases which we have been able to judge, a study of higher English seems to have killed the student's individuality, and his literary efforts have tended towards bombast and artificiality.

To date professors have been content to admonish students for their illiterate complex, feeling we may presume, that the teaching of elementary English principles belongs to the High School curriculum: but because these institutions are unsuccessful in this undertaking is no reason for University officials to deplore the fact and feel satisfied that their obligation is thereby met.

A course in writing simple and correct English would be a most valuable addition to the curriculum. We humbly offer this suggestion for the consideration of the proper authorities.

More Froth

Mrs. Frothingham, who is already being spoken of in international circles as that terrible lady from Brookline, Massachusetts, has certainly started something. It was the effervescent Mrs. Frothingham, if you remember, who requested the simmigration officials, wouldn't they please bar Herr Einstein from the U.S. as he was a member of "more communistic and anarchistic organizations than Stalin?"

Well, the Frothingham monkey wrench has been delicately picked up and tossed back into the machinery with still greater force by the board of the National Patriotic Council which has officially decided that Dr. Einstein is "a German Bolshevik" and which says that his theory of relativity "was of no scientific value or purpose, not understandable because there was nothing there to understand." The board has also demanded that bars be placed in front of Leon Trotsky and George Bernard Shaw because they are "radical and Communists."

Herr Einstein, meanwhile, has been busy with his rhetoric and the results show that if he wasn't such a famous mathematician, he could always become a "writing man." We think the professor's answer to Mrs. Frothingham is well worth re-printing in this column.

"Herr Einstein to Mrs. Frothingham et al:

"Give ear, therefore, to the sage patriotic dear ladies, and remember that the capital of mighty Rome was at one time saved by the cackling of her faithful geese. Never before has any attempt of mine at an approach to the beautiful sex met with such an energetic rebuff. Even should perchance such have ever been the case, then certainly, not by so many all at once.

"But aren't they perfectly right, these watchful citizenesses? Why should one admit, to one's presence one who devours hardboiled capitalists with the same appetite and relish as once upon a time the ogre Minotaurus in Crete devoured luscious Greek maidens — a person who in addition is so vulgar as to oppose every war, except the inevitable one with his own wife?"

We are glad to see that Dr. Einstein admits fighting with his wife. It proves, to our satisfaction at least, that he recognizes one form of government.

Student Marriages

A professor of sociology at a prominent American university recently expressed it as his belief that students in college should be allowed to get married. He qualified his remarks, it is true, with the somewhat ambiguous proviso "if they are truly in love." This detail, however, can be omitted in a consideration of the question, because if two students wish to get married it is of little concern to anyone else whether they are in love or not.

"The convention that a young man must not marry until he can support a wife has been productive of enormous misery, vice, and heartbreak," said the same professor. His idea seems a sound one. Equally undesirable is the convention that a man should not marry until his wife can support him. Taking it for granted that college students will not marry until they are at least nearing their final year,—might be possible to impose a rule of freshman inelibility in matrimony—we can see little objection to husband and wife living financially independent of each other for a brief period.

Student marriage would undoubtedly solve a lot of worries for the two participants. There would be no more of these obstinate questions, "Shall I take this woman to the dance, or that one, or neither?" It would be all settled. Whether he wanted to or not he would have to take his wife, or stay away. An inevitable obligation definitely removes anxiety. The path of least resistance becomes the only path.

Encouragement of student marriage would also have the effect of marrying students off upon each other—an obvious advantage to other people. An unmarried co-ed, being graduated out upon an unsuspecting world, is a potential menace to every would-be husband that has not been through the academic mill.

Only a college student could bear and appreciate such a wife.

There's A Difference

A period of illness for a girl is just so much time taken away from the best boy friend, so many cokes gone to waste, and so many dances missed. A woman comes into the hospital with the idea that she is there because she has to be, not because she thinks she needs to be. She may look ill, but she applies a fresh coating of color to cheeks and face and attains a healthy glow before she departs into the doctor's office. No matter what the illness, it isn't bad enough to warrant her staying in the hospital. She accepts the pills and goes on her way, lamenting all the while that she isn't sick, she just doesn't feel good.

But when a boy enters the hospital with his friend, they can be heard talking long before they reach the waiting hall. Their laughter and jokes continue to sound above the other conversation while the invalid awaits his turn. If appearance is an indication of feeling, this young gentleman is suffering from an overdose of vim and vitality.

When his name is called, he hastily changes expression and drags himself into the office, coughing vigorously. The list of ailments and symptoms he claims is appalling and the poor doctor is properly impressed. The physical wreck reappears in the hall and exultantly confides to his friend:

"I'm so sick, I gotta stay here. That sure makes me cry. Hope you pass the quiz in the morning. Give my love to the prof. And say—maybe you'd better bring me a copy of Ballyhoo."

Impromptu Dance Staged At Inverary On Saturday

Before the last echoes of the Arts Formal music had quite died away, Harold Clark, able director of the Battersea band, had, by a wave of his cord-wood baton, set going the umpteen-piece band which kicked at the heels of the fortunate many who attended the boarding house brawl.

The good people of Inverary sat back in astonishment at the news of a student conducted dance at which nothing was broken and no one became intoxicated but the bouncer team. The expansive and competent Bill Dennie, town marshall and hall superintendent declared next morning, that his job had been a shameless sinecure.

The mural decoration consisted of everything, including the kitchen stove, which was, however, left out of the student concocted sandwiches. The favors were Kazoos and Razzberries, take your choice unless you can handle both at once.

The conductors of this affair have established a precedent, in that they have been cordially invited by the townspeople to stage a repeat at any time, which, of course, they will, and how, and how.

Figures for the month of October made public by the University of Chicago Commons office disclose that the various university dining halls consumed 450 gallons of ice cream, 300 loaves of bread and an equal number of rolls, ten tons of meat, 7,000 gallons of milk, and 4,600 heads of lettuce.

The Asociated Women Students of the University of Alabama recently passed rules forbidding coeds to drink near beer.

Letters to the Editor

Editor of Queen's Journal,

Dear Sir:

In your issue of Friday January 27th, a letter written by four members of Science '36 was published under the nom de plume of "The Freshman Quartette",

At our Year Meeting on the afternoon of the same day our President informed us that he had been telephoned by a girl from Goodwin House who said: Quote — "there are twenty-five good-looking girls at Goodwin House who would all like invitations to the Science '36 Year Dance."

Now if these "willing-to-oblige" girls will kindly send their names and photographs (photographs necessary — names not so necessary) to the undersigned, 265 University Ave., perhaps invitations may be arranged for this all-important dance.

"The Freshmen Sextette."

P.S.—Now we are six.

The Editor,
Queen's Journal.

Dear Sir:

Your leading article on the subject of the Reference Shelves, published in the issue of January 20, was so moving an appeal that it would at once have been considered but for certain misstatements and misapprehensions.

In the first place the Reference library stands where it did, on the shelves in the Reading Room; and the hundreds of volumes offered to students for free consulation still repay the seeker.

In the second place the bookshelves placed in a separate room are only the books that have been reserved by professors for the reading of their classes. In segregating these volumes Queen's has only followed the example of practically every U. S. and Canadian university. The books were removed because the library could not longer allow classes to suffer for the acts of individuals. Appeals to the honour of the student have been many, but all have been ignored; and the loss during the past year of more than seventy volumes of books that were required almost hourly by classes could no longer be disregarded.

I can assure you, Sir, that these volumes do not gather dust. They are in constant demand. It is quite simple to obtain any volume required. If the author or title is known the assistant will immediately bring it; if the books required for the class are demanded they will be placed on the desk in front of the inquirer. Cards have been prepared on which are typed the authors and titles of the required books for each class; and typed lists of these books will shortly be displayed for all to see. The assistant in charge has no longer to waste any breath explaining to anxious students that the books required are missing; we hope, therefore, that a considerable gain in efficiency will be observed.

The vacant reference shelves are being filled as quickly as possible with interesting volumes from the stacks. I am sure that this library extension will be appreciated.

May I repeat: that the Reference Library is untouched except for some interesting additions: that the reserve books cannot now be the prey of the selfish individual; and that every effort is being made to facilitate the work of the student who is not well acquainted with his required reading.

I am, Sir,
Yours faithfully,
E. C. KYTE,
University Librarian.

The Editor.
Queen's Journal.

Dear Sir,—

In response to your appeal for support at the Queen's hockey games, may I say that we get no support from the A.B.C.

At the game Monday night, two students attempted to see the game and support the team. One had his book of tickets, but the other, unfortunately, was late and lacked time to get his book of tickets; and he was ejected at the gate by an officious attendant, (after a conference with Mr. Hicks); notwithstanding the fact that he was identified at the gate by the student representative, and his companion, and has attended the majority of all hockey games during the past four years, at the university.

Now I ask you, is this officiousness necessary, and does it benefit the college any? Efficiency is to be commended, but when over done it becomes ridiculous. Naturally, two loyal hockey supporters are disillusioned.

Dear Mr. Editor,—

With Levana's kind permission may I make reply to "Bewildered" concerning those "delightful At Homes."

There is just this much to be said for him—He's seeking after knowledge—quite commendable indeed!

That this university isn't here solely for the purpose of acquiring degrees and scholarships would seem lucky for we moronish, males. I like that word moronish—won't his Psychology prof. be pleased to think his student has gathered in one word out of his course. The Psychologists have told me that there is one class below the moron in mental deficiency—that is the idiot. I suppose the only reason that we didn't have the term "idiotish" applied is that the word just doesn't fit his aesthetic senses.

However! In History when we're discussing wars (pardon the connection), we usually look for the underlying causes. Now who could guess the reason for that letter.

Did he develope a bilious attack five minutes before the dance and couldn't go?—that is plenty I grant you, to sour anyone's life forever, or is it just possible (whisper! Sh! that he didn't get an invitation).

But how could that be! Such mentality! (Honours from Rockwood probably), such physique! Surely he has kept his 'light under a basket'—and then some fair-one has kicked the basket.

Alack! that some of us don't grow up. Others become gorillas and all become moronish. How out of place we must have looked amongst the beautiful decorations of flowers, etc.? Oh! Levana, if you ever start discriminating, I for one will just have to hit for the wide open spaces.

In closing would it not be fitting to ask "Bewildered" for his photo in the Journal appearing preferably in Gym. attire, or even in a "human tux"—a model for the Ban Righ girls to go by in making their next choice!

Would anyone suggest that he give tutorials "In how to feel at home in a tub"?

A PINK TEA GUY.

MORE ABOUT CRITICS

If critics to be understood
May only speak of what is good,
However much, however slight,
In plays that run a single night
'Twould seem to be a trifle odd
To criticize at all, by G-d!
We might, however, comprehend
The attitude of any friend
Of drama, and dramatic art,
Who had its interest at heart,
(Unhampered by a lack of wit
And biased just because of it)
Provided only, if you please,
He did not suffer from disease,
In shape of that malignant tumour
An utter lack of sense of humour.
But when defective mental balance
Is joined with absence of such talents
As normal people would suppose
Are necessary for writing prose—
To say no word of what much worse is,
Composing clever dogg'rel verses—
Without a moment's hesitation
We clamour for an explanation.
In fact, whatever way we view it
We feel J. R. should never do it.
His lines were long and most long-winded,
His temper strong and little-minded,
The verse itself was so infernal
'Twas rotten even for the Journal.
The limping metre hobbled on Until all hope of rhythm was gone,
So utterly confused, the tune was even feebler than the rime.
But both of those, howe'er distraught,
Were rather stronger than the thought,
Although in spots 'twas hard to choose Between the metre and the views
For one was weak and very lame
And t'other very much the same.
In fact no more to linger on it,
A bee was in the writer's bonnet.
And since J. R. declaimed so much
It's scarcely strange he's got in "dutch."

BARDOLPH.

Queen's University.

Dear Mr. Editor.

Those who are proud to rejoice in the questionable advantage of an artistic temperament are rarely able to remain silent under criticism. Under appreciative attention they tend to expand visibly; under less favourable notice they become querulously vocal. In either event they are insufferable.

The recent "storm in a tea-cup" occasioned by the witty review of "March Hares," which appeared in last Tuesday's "Journal," affords an excellent example of this unfortunate condition. The "Reply to Critics", printed over the initials J. R. need not detain us because it contained nothing better than maunderings puerilities of the would-be vitriolic type. But the letter from Mr. R. A. Browne, which is at once pointed, unfair, and inaccurate, calls for comment.

It is not true that W. McL. and B.W. left the show at the end of the second act. They stayed till the final curtain, as anyone whose powers of observation were not impaired by natural defect or by personal prejudice could have detected. We must suppose that this last deformity accounts for the accusation contained in the final paragraph of the letter, in which W. McL. and B.W. are charged with being swayed by personal prejudice. Mr. Browne would be well advised himself to direct that same critical attention of which he speaks to the object of his attack. I challenge him to find any signs of personal prejudice in it or any trace of ill-feeling.

Unfortunately Mr. Browne's sense of humour is so stunted as to prevent him from seeing the thing in its true likeness. It is a pity, however, that he should find it necessary to expose his deformities to the public gaze.

I am, Mr. Editor,
Yours, etc.,
CHOREGOS.

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY—When Brown defeated Columbia recently, one of the New York co-eds was seriously injured when hit on the head by a falling goal post which the Brown enthusiasts had torn down.

A Freshman wrote an English theme the other day, the subject of which was a pack-trip in New Mexico. At one point in this theme he wrote: "The next morning we packed our dufflebags, loaded them on our 'burrows,' and started off." When the theme was handed back, this startling piece of misspelling had elicited from the professor the following comment: "Very good, but you don't know your mule from a hole in the ground."

Laughter

Laughter is one of the infectious diseases, believed by the ancients to be one of the causes of obesity. Here as in other subjects, the language of technology is unsatisfactury. To say that laughter is a rapidly repeated contraction of the muscles of the diaphragm and abdominal wall, accompanied by a series of barking exhalations released by a periodic forcing open of the spastic glottis is scientific but not enlightening. The act of laughing is the reaction of human beings and possibly some animals to something funny, but while there are plenty of definitions of what constitutes something funny, there seems to be no obtainable information on the why and the wherefore of the funniness, or why it elicits mirth. Perhaps certain combinations of synaptic transmissions of energy between brain cells provides the stimulus for the laugh reflex as does the tickling of certain areas of the skin. That a tickling of brain cells has been thought of as a possible explanation is perhaps shown by the use of the word "tickled" for "amused."

It was said that laughter is an infectious disease. Its infectious nature is well known. One unconsciously smiles in answer to a smile. Very few people and no knowable people can laugh alone. That it is a disease in the literal sense of the word is evidenced by the condition of a person in the throes of a hilarious convulsion. He is weakly unable to perform any co-ordinated action and his mental activities are temporarily out of commission. Some people laugh continually. It is a disease, however, that may be cured with relative ease, in its acute forms at least, and as a counter-irritant it is frequently useful in the treatment of other diseases. A limited attack promotes nervous relaxation, and is stimulative to reparative processes. The advice of the ancients to "laugh and grow fat" might be better understood in the form "cease fretting and escape the inanition consequent to worry."

Laughter is one of the primitive reflexes inhibited by the higher centres. In the true professorial type, the display of humourous appreciation is seldom allowed to go beyond the stage of the tight-lipped smile; people in conditions of mild intoxication laugh easily and frequently. The giggle is not properly a reaction to a humourous word or situation. It usually begins as a nervous effort to distract attention from a personal weakness, and in many cases becomes a reasonless unbreakable habit.

Both philosophers and arbitrators of elegance have at times looked upon open laughter as unbecoming high intelligence. Epictitus in his philosopher's handbook, advices "let your laughter be not on many occasions nor in great measure," and Chesterfield's contemptuous description of the "hideous contortions and purple face" of the laughing man has probably deterred some few, very few, from the free expression of their amusement.

Like most instinctive reflexes, laughter may be imitated, rather badly by voluntary contractions of the proper groups of muscles. Forced laughter is usually sycophantic and is almost always distinguishable from a spontaneous ebullition. The dutiful snicker that follows the lecturer's moss-fined crack is a very different thing from honest mirth.

As has been said, merriment is frequently an effective therapeutic agent and the doctor who can brighten his patient's viewpoint has started his treatment well. And such an effect is not to be produced by a presentation of a stock of humorous remarks. It must usually be the result of direct infection from the mood of the physician.

Medical students should cultivate the Pollyanna in their natures.

Gastronomical Gorge Held By Gourmands of Meds '34

Meds '34, unruffled by vexatious strife that threatens to tear apart one or two of the years in Medicine, turned out forty strong to a celibate party at the Queen's Kaff.

Mine host Arniel, had sent out the hunters and blood hounds for some days prior to the G. I. gorge and announced he was ready to toss a bountiful meal over the shoulders of the boys. All he had to do then was purchase a few new mops and the party was on.

The boys who recalled eating the meal announced that it was as good as promised, and we can recommend the menu for future stomach distentions.

Arriving at 6.15 for a chin wetter the boys found a fair supply of Elixer de Hoppe, on hand and this served to produce all the gastric secretions needed and in some cases far too much. For those who did not care to gaze upon the Hoppes when converted into an elixer, a few gallons of cider, reputed to be as soft and harmless as a maiden's cheek were provided. This cider packed a couple of sledge hammers in every gulp, and the boys who relied upon its W. C. T. U. nature were sadly embarassed before the evening was over, when they tried to tackle the fireplace.

The gulping party was featured by some well known classical sungs, led by Joe Joesephson the bronchitic tenor. Scotty McGuwan insisted upon leading the year through his specialty Allonette, and managed to get half way.

Meds '34 could not hold a dinner without letting loose a lot of articulation and this dinner was no exception, though a lot of the toasts did not come off as planned. Bill Clarke, an outstanding member of the British Columbia Temperance Union, gave, or started to give a talk on the evils of alcohol. The speaker grew dry as he dwelt upon the terrible results of the vile concoctions, now thrown wide to the pulic, and in a burst of passion he declared that henceforth he would not tolerate one drop even in his shaving lotion. His speech was somewhat interrupted by a few of the boys sliding under the table, but as he reached for another glass, the temperance orator forgot the rest of his talk.

Bud Galloway was scheduled to give a short talk on Gambling and its Horrors, but he never got around to it. In fact Bud offers to bet anyone that gambling doesn't pay or was it gamblers don't pay.

Pretzel Ace Stewart, surprised everybody that evening by remaining perpendicular to the earth's surface, he not having one speech to make all during the affair.

Card games were planned for following the dinner but as Len Remus got to the Elixer early and stayed late, the supply ran out and who wanted to play cards anyway?

Five Articulations Enough To Cover Range of Laughter

New York, N.Y.—Five articulations are sufficient to cover the range of human laughter, says Polyxene Kamhouropoulou, who has taken up the question of "individual senses of humor" quite seriously.

"Hee-hee" convey "the hiss and sneer of a trickishly gained victory."

"Hey-hey" is "characteristic of the gallant victor who enjoys a pure-hearted laugh."

"Hoo-hoo" is expressive of "contempt at a worsted wretch who is now at our mercy."

"Ho-ho" is a scoff of self-exultation, and "ha-ha" marks disgust."

Writer Journeyed to Vassar

It's all recorded in a thesis submitted in partial fulfillment of the requirements for a Doctor's degree in Philosophy. Mr. Kambouropoulou journeyed to Vassar for the necessary material, where one hundred of the fairest volunteered to undergo the necessary observation, all for the sake of science.

First, the experimental group was requested to submit individual diaries in which "all the things they laugher at and everything that amused them every day" were to be recorded. They were further told to grade their jokes A, B and C according to the amount of humor derived.

Girls Laugh to be Polite

A large percentage of the class was ascertained to derive the most fun out of incongruous situations. These were the girls who thought items like the following extremely hilarious:

"Got a great kick out of reading in a news article that escorts spend over a million dollars taking 'dates' to the Yale-Harvard football game."

"Girl called me 'frowsy,' and I called her 'frumpy.' We undoubtedly have perverted senses of humor, as this seemed to be riotously funny at the time for no reason at all.

"Laughed loud and long at the sight of my roommate sitting down hard on a chair and hurting the 'end of

S. C. M. Shrapnel

A speaker was heard the other day advising a group who were interested in social change. He suggested that as critics of an institution they should thoroughly understand the society which they criticized. That seems to be sound principle. Any reformer whether he is a surgeon or an architect, ought to understand the structure of the thing which he wants to remodel.

The church, and what is popularly called religion, surely deserves as fair treatment as the social order. Before criticism is launched it ought to be studied, lest the results be comparable to those which a bull might achieve in the proverbial china shop. As an instance consider the missionary work of the Church. One hears that missionaries have done more harm than good, that they have been agents of religious and even economic imperialism. Contrast with such attitudes the following comments of an experienced missionary speaking on "Missions and the great social movements of this decade."

"Failures there have been, but failure there has not been. Those things which you have put into the statistical tables and which you have considered as the principal result of Christian Missions—put those in for the moment as the by-product, and what you have considered as the by-product consider as the principal results of Christian Missions, and what do you see? Static civilizations have become mobile. . . . India that was static and inert (is) roused and moving so rapidly that any man who is out of India for even six months goes back to a strangely changed land. . . . It is not an exaggeration to say that the conscience of the world today is Christian. The ministry to the underprivileged has gone far beyond the Christian Church. Healing has become the concern of states. . . . The Proletariat movement, the women's movement—all these great transformations in the life of the mission fields are results in a large measure of the Christian missionary enterprise. . . . Not that they are altogether due to missions. . . . but at least Christian missions were in the procession that marched around these ancient jerichoes of superstition, ignorance, darkness, injustice, oppression, and grief."

That may be taken as an illustration that criticism from the inside can be quite fair. And it is surely more intelligent than reckless statements which fail to understand the institution.

Science Frosh To Make Merry Next Friday Night

One of the biggest little events of the year takes place next Friday night. Science '36 is entertaining, in spite of the Freshman Quartette and its supporting cast. As it is alleged that there are 25 girls in Goodwin House ready to go dancing —with Frosh—our first year dance will be this week—before they get a good look at us and change their minds. Come along and get your ducking before the big swim next week.

Music?—the best in the city — none other than Bob. Warmington, and Rupe Dumbrille will sing a song or three. Bob will commence playing in Grant Hall at 8.30, Friday night. A competent committee, headed by Boko Brown, has done everything in its power to assure a successful party. Tickets may be procured from the afore-mentioned Boko, Arch. Campbell, Al. Ross, Andy Anderson or Gord. McMahon.

AT THE CAPITOL

STRANGE INTERLUDE
with Norma Shearer, Clark Gable, and others

Strange Interlude, as interpreted on the screen, makes one feel that the critic who called O'Neill plays "high-brow melodrama" may have been near the truth. It must, however, be admitted that O'Neill's power, his fine sense of dramatic construction, have been preserved almost intact in the screen play. His characters, alas, have not fared so happily.

Nina Leeds, as interpreted by Miss Shearer, is neurotic enough for the most exacting. But the original Nina was much more than just an aphrodisiac. Miss Shearer does not adequately convey the tragic tension, the latent strength of O'Neill's heroine. Mr. Clark Gable is convincing at first as the doctor. But when it is required of him to age, his added years are so patently studio makeup, that one refuses to take his work seriously.

A word about the "asides." On first hearing, they appear as an absurd and confusing anomaly. (One is reminded of advertisements for a well-known soap. He said, "My dear, how charming you look tonight!" He thought: "M—G—! etc., etc.") But curiously enough, one becomes used to them, and accepts them quite naturally by the middle of the picture. B.

AT THE TIVOLI

PENGUIN POOL MURDER
Edna May Oliver—Robert Armstrong

Sherlock Holmes with his scientific methods of crime deduction has been supplanted by the intuition of a woman, in the "Penguin Pool Murder." Edna May Oliver as a prim "school marm" proves to be the real driving force behind the solving of the murder in the penguin pool of an aquarium.

A rather dull and loose plot is worked out with some good comedy in the quick comebacks of "Miss Withers," the school teacher, and in the dry remarks of "Detective Piper." The story is rather drawn out and the solution of the crime is somewhat slip shod.

Robert Armstrong, as "Piper," carries his part well and the change of attitude to the various murder suspects, during the investigation is good. The part of the fussing school marm is a good burlesque and is not to be taken seriously. On the whole the picture is a better comedy than detective story.

Other features on the bill were of differing merits. A rather interesting short showing of the manufacture of big guns for battle ships is good and a troup of negro entertainers provides a little sparkle to the program, but the "Slim" Summerville comedy ought to have been left in the can. Altogether it's worth C plus.

AMERICAN SLANG

Seattle, Wash—We can "have a grouch," fail to "get" someone's idea, shout "and how!" or even become "sore" without slipping up in our usage of good English, according to Professor Allen R. Benham of English.

Dr. Banham in an interview recently staunchly defended slang, that much-abused but oft-used species of language usually relegated to the grammatical underworld.

"Slang is incipient poetry," he declared. "In aptness, descriptive power and pngency, when not allowed to become trite, slang phrases add vitally to formal English grammar."

Many words and phrases regarded by present-day school-ma'ams as beyond the pale of correct speech once rubbed syllables with the verbal Four Hundred, Dr. Benham said.

"You've plenty of classic precedent for using slang," he stated. "Shakespeare, Chaucer and many other famous craftsmen of English used phrases currently correct which we've now outlawed, for no apparent reason," he added with a smile.

Local campus slang also comes under the professor's approval. He likes "float hours," "As U Were" cards, and even "cutting" classes—the last, only as a phrase, however, he intimated.

So it's O.K. to drag out and dust off those pariah-dog expressions—but let's leave the cobwebs on "Oh yeah?"

Book Chats

By R.M.

Some writer or other has objected to Thomas Hardy's novels because ineluctable fate sits grimly smiling in the last chapter." Hardy believes in an immanent force which moulds man ruthlessly to its ends. Quite true! Nevertheless, Hardy is a great artist because he gives expression, lucidly, to just those values of human life that are most significant to him. He has a philosophy of life; voices it through his characters; and shows them acting out their lives in conformity to that idea. So there is variety in uniformity: unity in the parts of his stories and in the sum of the parts.

Perhaps, this philosophy is most aptly set forth in the Dynasts, but it infuses all his works including "Tess of the D'Urbervilles." Must we tell the story? So he it. Tess is the central character and the tale might be summarized by narrating the things that are done to her. Thus her mother's pleas drive her to seek mythical relatives at Trantridge. A series of inevitable circumstances contrive for her undoing. After a period of mourning in which she seeks remission for her sin in being seduced, Tess leaves home to be a milk-maid, falls desperately in love with a young apprentice farmer, Angel Clare, and all seems rosy if Tess could only forget her past. But that's impossible. She goes on to the bitter end; returns to her clandestine lover, Alec D'Urberville, lives with him for a while, finally murdering him in cold blood. Certainly, one finds a morbid fascination in following Tess right up till the hangman's noose claims its due. How stimulating to read a story that hasn't a happy ending!

To follow Tess Durbeyfield's career to its bitter end, requires a detached, objective appreciation of an extremely high intellectual order. All the more so since Tess was "a fine handsome girl with a mobile, peony mouth and large innocent eyes which added eloquence to colour and shape." Before she leaves on the expedition to Trantridge she is a mere vessel of emotion, guileless and unaware of the latent evil in the masculine cosmos. And like all simple village girls intensely sensitive and religious. Thus the extreme penance she goes through after her fall from grace is wholly in keeping with her character. Many other instances might be introduced to illustrate Hardy's masterly motivation of character, but this will suffice. The use of dialogue, racy with the vernacular of the Wessex region, throws light on character. Too, there is a rare harmony between setting and the people who have their being in those surroundings.

I do not propose to go into an exhaustive criticism of this book. Such is beyond the scope of this column and my abilities. Yet one can remark on a few noteworthy features. Instance the following sentence, typical of Hardy's descriptive powers: "Ethiopic scorchings browned the upper slopes of the pastures, but there was still bright green herbage here where the water-courses purled." That was chosen at random; almost any page could show a similar passage. Take a look at this piece of dialogue, spoken by Dairyman Dick: "You can milk 'em clean, my maidy? I don't want my cows going azew at this time of the year." And isn't this like a sardonic laugh from Fate itself, "In the ill-judged execution of the well-judged plan of things, the call seldom produces the comer, the man to love rarely coincides with the hour for loving." I rest my case there. If anyone has been induced to read Tess or having read it, finds a few clues to a better appreciation in these random remarks—well 'tis a fair thought.

Ubyssey Tenders Some Hints Anent Tuxedos

About the tux, or Tuxedo, depending on what you pay for it. Or them.

A tuxedo is an absolutely colorless garment consisting of 17 pieces. Or 18, depending on the studs. These studs are rivet-like affairs designed to hold the various pieces together. They are inserted, with shattered dignity a crow-bar, into the shirt at various strategic points. For the meaning of strategic, ask King John to show you his dictionaries. Or ask the C.O.T.C.

In front, protecting the chest and tummy—or abdomen—is a cuirass (if that's the word we want) of stiffened shirt-material. Why it is stiffened we do not know. It is rigid enough to be uncomfortable, and yet not armor-plated enough to resist bullets, or ice-cream either.

The collar is also starch-impregnated to such an extent that it has a saw-like effect on one's neck. Men have been known to commit suicide by rapidly rotating the head—and neck, of course—against the collar. The record time for severing the jugular is 34 seconds, while the complete decapitation has been accomplished by one enthusiast in 3 minutes, 24 seconds. The runner-up to this last advice had a fish-bone stuck in his gullet, which materially slowed him up.

If you wish to brighten up your tux, don't, whatever you do, wear loud yellow socks or a green tie, or something like that. The thing must be done subtly, and unobtrusively. Try a pair of scarlet cuff-links to begin with.

You may also enliven your ensemble by wearing diamond studs in your shirt front. I do not advise diamond studs for the back collar-button — something about half an inch in diameter. Anything smaller is apt to be considered a trifle Woolworthy.

But do not carry this advice to extremes. Do not go to a dance with a tie pin stuck in your fourth-hand. Not even a tasteful combination of rubies, emeralds and lapis-lazuli will do.

Then when they moved you here, they shoved you into this corner. Thoughtless men. They left you just like an ordinary statue. You've been here for some time, now. Yet I doubt if anyone ever came to speak to you. Forgotten. Yes even by the chairman of the A.B. of C. and the Secretary, also. Life's like that. Here you are abandoned. Sculptors claim yours is one of the few perfect figures. What has it brought you? Nothing but animal stares. Won't you let me hold your hand? Speak to me."

What, you won't take it? You're the first woman . . . You can't get away with that. I'll shove it down your throat. Curses she's fainted. She's falling!!. (She falls to the floor. Fraternity Men Prove That Chivalry Is Not Yet Dead

Minneapolis — Knighthood is still in flower.

At least 50 lonely women who were rescued from despair by a legion of University of Minnesota Greeks, believe it or not.

It all happened this way. Sponsors of a fraternity bowery party which was given a few nights ago, received an emergency call on the telephone asking for men, and more men.

The sponsors gasped—and then issued an urgent call for aid. After 15 minutes of frantic recruiting the order was filled, and the ancient traditions of chivalry were maintained.

When the first volunteers arrived at the scene of the trouble they found that the women in distress were members of a famous troupe of chorus girls, appearing at a local theatre.

QUEEN'S BASKETBALLERS WIN OPENER

Queen's Basketeers Down Invading Toronto Team

long one which went cleanly through the basket.

For Varsity Allison was the more outstanding. But for him the score would have been more one-sided. He was also their high scorer.

The play wasn't all Queen's by any means. The Varsity forward line were particularly persistent and toward the end of the game when the score was tied they fought with practically all their team under the basket, but the Tricolor would not become rattled and just coolly awaited their chance to score the winning basket plus a foul shot to sew up the game.

Varsity scored the first basket of the game shortly after the first half got under way when Allison potted one under the basket. However, shortly afterwards Donny Bews came back to tie up the score with one of his sensational long shots. Allison seemed to be Varsity's main scoring threat during this half, but he was matched shot for shot by Bews, each scoring six points. In the meantime Wilf Newman accompanied by some brilliant combination play by Hallett and McMahon, scored three points. Howie Carter came on at this point to relieve Newman at centre and Doug. Rooke relieved Hallett. Rooke started right in and on a nice pass from McMahon scored a pretty basket.

Half time score Queen's 11, Varsity 10.

The second half provided more basketball and more excitement for the fans. Close checking and beautiful combination play by both teams featured. The score see-sawed back and forth, first one team being ahead then the other. With five minutes to play and the score tied Queen's called time out in order to get organized again. Coming back on McLaughlin connected with one of his long shots and sank a beauty. Varsity were a little over anxious to tie things up again and Bews was fouled. Donny came through nicely and scored another one to put Queen's three points ahead when the whistle blew.

Senior "B's" Beaten By Fast R.M.C. Team

Queen's tasted defeat after sixty minutes of gruelling hockey at the Harty Arena, Friday night, when an inspired R.M.C. team, led by the one and only "Pop" Irvin, eked out a 4-3 win in a Sr. "B" O.H.A. struggle.

The game was tied up three times, neither team being more than one goal in the lead at any time. The climax to a bitterly fought game came in the third period when R.M.C. went in the lead with five minutes to go. The Tricolor threw every man but the goaltender on the attack, but the Red and White team withstood the onslaught until the end.

Without doubt, "Pop" Irvin, the veteran of the College team, playing one of the best games of his career, was the outstanding man on the ice. His rushes were sensational and he exerted a steadying effect on the yonthful R.M.C. team.

For Queen's, Patterson and Arthurs were best on the forward wall while Storms, Kostuik and Teague played a bang-up game on defence.

Believe it or not, both goalies scored—but on their own teams! Outside of this freak occurrence, Daniels and White turned good performances in their cages.

By virtue of their win, R.M.C. practically puts the group honors in the bag for Kingston.

When Bill Carr scored on a pass from Arthurs early in the first period, it looked like just another game for the Tricolor, but Kelly came back around the Queen's nets and Daniels scored on himself when he had difficulty in clearing Kelly's shot. "Jr" Elliott came right back with a rush, but White knocked his shot aside. In a scramble in front of the Tricolor nets, Peck scored to put the Red and White team one up. Big John Kostuik didn't like this so he tried hard but White slid out to save his shot. Bob Elliott happened along just then and he flipped the rubber over the prostrate goalie to again tie things up.

Storms started proceedings in the second chukker, when his shot was poorly handled by White who dropped it in for the third and last Tricolor goal. Irvin got a big hand from the crowd on a lovely attempt, but "Danny" shut the door. Bill Carr almost scored, but hoisted the disc right over the nets and that kind don't count. Storms was in on a rush that looked like the real goods, but had his ardor dampened when Kelly pried up on him. Patterson flipped a hot one at White, but the R.M.C. goalie batted it down. Peck came right in with only Daniels to beat, but "Danny" saved and Carr urged Peck along on his way to help matters. Patterson and Kelly locked horns in front of the R.M.C. nets, but the gladiators were banished before anything serious developed. Lamortagne tied the score up again as the period closed on a pass from Kelly.

With two old rivals like Queen's and R.M.C., a tied score, and only one period left to play, things are bound to happen—and how they did! Both teams let loose with everything they had and the play shuttled back and forth with lightning speed. Things started to happen when Patterson cut in with a terrific shot, but Irvin came up the ice and returned the compliment. Bill Carr almost scored when he zoomed across the front of the R.M.C. nets. The trippings were plentiful and Ready and Elliott were benched. Irvin sent over a perfect pass to Kelly, but he missed it. Storms was slapping all and sundry down at the defence and he handed out an especially stiff check to his former College playmate, Irvin, who didn't relish it. On the next play, Irvin skated like a madman and as he reached the defence, leaped into Storms who went down like the proverbial ton of bricks. Just nice clean fun.

Patterson tried hard but White was invincible and held out all shots. With five minutes to go Irvin laid over a beautiful pass to Peck, who picked out the net with the winning goal. Nothing daunted, the Tricolor sent up five men on the attack and rained shot after shot on White, who rose to great heights to shut them out.

Kostuik and Patterson almost put the rubber across the line, but the whole R.M.C. team leaped into and in front of the nets to keep it out.

The referees had a controversy with the timers who called the game too soon, but no further scoring resulted.

Hell must be harder hit by depression than any other business if it is true that money is the source of all earthly evil.—Minnesota Daily.

Seniors at Kentucky University remove corduroy trousers from underclassmen who dare to wear them, and toss the offending frosh into trees.

Sports Views

The basketballers, Junior and Intermediate, see action during the week, both teams being scheduled to play R.M.C. squads on Wednesday, Feb. 1st.

The Juniors have lost both their two starts but Joe Josephson, the manager is not downhearted and feels that his charges are quite capable of breaking into the win column against the Cadets.

The Intermediates handed Napanee a tidy licking in the opening game of the series and are pointing for another victory when the meet the College.

The Senior "B" team foozled away a very good chance to tie Kingston by turning in a wretched exhibition against the Cadets and losing 4 goals to 3. While they might not have downed Frontenacs, still they would have attracted a large crowd for their home game with the latter team, but that is just about shot now.

These Cadets never quit no matter how many games they lose in a series. It is possible that Queen's took them too lightly after their easy win over them in the first meeting.

The gym was packed for the basketball fest on Saturday. The fans saw three good games, the Senior "A" and the Senior "B" battles being close and exciting all through.

As a result of the walloping they took at the hands of McGill on Friday evening, 48 to 25, and the defeat handed them by Queen's on Saturday, Varsity are now going to have an uphill climb to get anywhere in the race.

Queen's were always on top though the margin was never great. But the question that fans are asking is "What kind of a team have McGill?" If Queen's just nosed out Varsity, after the latter had been through a tough game the evening previous, McGill must have been just about perfect to down them by such a score when Varsity was fresh. However, that question will be answered next Saturday when McGill pays us a visit. We can get a line on Western's entry also for the latter invade Toronto on the same date.

Those who saw R.M.C and O.A.C. fight it out are convinced that the basketball as played by Senior "B" teams is not as fast as that played in the major loop. The middle game was a tightly fought affair however, and there was little difference between the two teams. If McMaster's entry is as good as either of the two who played Saturday, there should be a merry fight for first place in the minor circuit.

Friday, February 3rd brings Queen's and Frontenacs together in a Senior "B" game and it is unfortunate that there is also a B. W. and F. meet scheduled for the same evening. This hockey game is a Queen's home game and the players were looking for a bumper crowd to help them win.

By the time the present day college boy succeeds in accumulating the horsehide, the pigskin, the coonskin and finally the sheepskin, poor father hasn't much hide left either.

SPORTS SLANTS

Varsity's Basketeers, hailed as a wonder team during the past few weeks, got off to a very ordinary start. McGill must be good.

* * * * * *

Incidently Queen's are not so bad either. They played a very careful game, but broke through when opportunity offered. The fans having looked them over, are quite satisfied that they will give them all a run.

* * * * * *

Scotty McGowan announces another swat and roll fest with a Toronto Club as the opposition. It will clash with the Senior "B" home game against Kingston, but that cannot be helped.

* * * * * *

O.A.C. and R.M.C. staged a pretty struggle but it was obvious that the basketball was not as fast as that played in the senior loop.

* * * * * *

How about a decent scoreboard for the gym. placed where most of the fans can see it? Placed over the door behind the player's benches, it would help wonderfully in following the game.

MILLER MUSEUM

Kingstonians in general and Queen's University in particular may well be proud of the fact that the Miller Building for geology and mineralogy is one of the few that was mentioned in the report on Canadian museum conditions made for the Carnegie Corporation by Sir Henry Miers and S. F. Markham. "Only a dozen museum buildings in Canada are well worthy of the towns in which they are situated", reads the report and pursuant to that remark directs attention to the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto, the Miller Building for geology and mineralogy in Kingston and several others. Your reporter after reading such a glowing account thought he would amble over to Miller Hall and see "what it was all about".

Passing through the main doorway, one comes into a glass partitioned hallway. On the right is a big wing containing mainly mineral specimens and on the left is the home of rocks and fossils. Thus we see the museum is divided into two great divisions—one, geology, the other, mineralogy. In the hall itself are two interesting cases. The one on the right illustrates rock formations, actual pieces of the various types of rock being pieced together into intrusive dykes, stratified limestone, sandstone and so on. The case on the left known as the Bell Collection represents a north-south section through the Province of Ontario from Lake Erie—all the characteristic fossils are present in layers, wooden strips dividing the "strata" or hands and you can even find the escarpment of Niagara Falls. Geology students are advised to spend some time in this hallway—these two cases are almost a course in formational and historical geology in themselves.

Entering the geological wing, one comes face to face with rocks of all sizes and shapes and nearly every colour of the rainbow. Curious round pieces of schist are just inside the door. They were originally used by some pioneer in an old corn mill. Thus we see at once that rocks are "of use". A little further along sodalite syenite with its deep blue colour is outstanding. Then there are glassy rocks which belong to a class known as lavas—that is outpourings of melted rock upon the earth's surface from volcanoes. Many of these lavas show little round spots which are due to the fact that they once contained bubbles of gas—such lavas are then known as "vesicular"—that's a good name, remember it. A case of black rocks contains coals, tars and a type of asphalt from Utah called Gilsonite. A little farther along you come upon a serpentine dolomite of a nice green colour which should be popular with our Irish students. Then Limburgite a rock from Tarback Germany which does not even faintly resemble the well-known cheese. Technically, limburgite is a lamprophyre of the calc-alk intrusives belonging to the hypabyssal group of rocks. Put that under your hat—if you will. Porphyries next hold our attention—they have a spotted appearance due to larger pieces of mineral being outstanding in a background of small bits of the same kind. Everyone should at least be able to recognize them because "gold" is often in the vicinity of porphyry. You fellows who are fond of giving your girl flowers should like the "floral harite" which resembles a rose perfectly and is far more permanent. "Red chalk" from Hunstanton England is quite different to the kind you are so familiar with. The red colour is due to the presence of iron.

Turning for the moment from the rock to the fossil section we find a tree trunk all turned to stone which still shows some of the bark clinging to it; the skeleton of a walrus and the tusk of a mastodon. Models of many night-mare-like dinosaurs occupy one case and the various epochs are all carefully illustrated by typical fossil remains. A rather interesting specimen is a bit of amber or "fossilised resin" which has an insect inside. The poor creature must have got stuck in the resin at an early period—but never mind it looks like a mosquito. It is now time to go over to the mineralogical wing and as you walk towards the door of the geological section you notice a case of vein fillings from various big mining centres, gold from Kirkland Lake and silver from Cobalt all nicely polished so that you can see the structure. (Geology students will remember that the silver of Cobalt is related to diabase instrusions).

In the mineralogical wing, we find a collection of minerals all carefully arranged according to Dana's classification—thus providing an excellent opportunity for study purposes. Rare crystals of sapphire and beryl and numerous varieties of amphiboles and pyrozenes are present, the collection is very complete. Then there is a case devoted to crystals of the various minerals and you can see that perfect crystals actually exist although it is a rare thing to find them. There is a case of minerals from Great Bear Lake—the mining regions about which there has been so much talk recently on account of the great "find" of radium and silver ores. It is interesting to know that the same "group" of minerals (silver, Cobalt, nickel, bismuth, etc.) has been found at Great Bear as were found at Cobalt with the exception of radium ore which was not found at Cobalt. Thus the two deposits may have been formed at the same period of intrusion.—it remains to be worked out. The radium ore at Great Bear Lake is "pitchblende" the non-crystalline variety of uranium oxide which doesn't contain thorium. Many of the radium occurrences of the World are "uraninite" the crystalline variety of uranium oxide containing thorium which occurs in pegmatite dykes and is so often spasmodic and thus uncommercial. Anyone that likes to tell fortunes can go and gaze into the absolutely flawless quartz crystal in the case along the north wall which also contains "geodes" or holes in the crystalline rocks in which good crystals are often found and which are often of gem quality. One of the reasons why so few gems have been found in Canada is that there are few geodes present in our rocks, the gems when they do occur being in the solid rock mass. The twisting and strain which the rocks have undergone has cracked the crystals so that they have lost their quality as gems. Another case contains gold and silver ores. You can actually see the gold sticking out of the rock—but the average grade of gold rock in Canada is about $9 a ton and the gold is invisible. In the centre of the wing is a good wooden model of a mine called the "Iron Mask" showing the various levels.—By this time you will have noticed that the names of many minerals and rocks end in "ite" which means stone.

The "Economic Mineralogy" section nearest to the gym. is one of the most interesting in this wing. Everyone should drop in and see it for even if you don't care at all about minerals, it is just as well to be able to recognize some of the more valuable ones for when you are out paddling your girl along the shore of some of our northern lakes on your vacation you might happen to see a vein of gold ore—just think of the chance you would otherwise have missed. The economic section is divided up into a number of cases, each case illustrating some economic mineral and its use in the arts. So we find the lead-zinc case and most of us know to what purposes these useful metals are put. Then the antimony case which illustrates how antimony is made into "type metal" so that we may have newspapers and books; the nickel case shows monel metal and then the asbestos case with its "fireproof" ropes and packing. The talc case shows the soft white, slippery mineral talc from which the well-known "talcum powder" is made. Quartz, used for jewellery such as amethyst, and fused quartz used a refractory in furnaces are found in another case along with "flint" arrow heads which goes to prove that quartz was "useful" even to primitive peoples. Numerous other cases are found—phosphates useful for soils and medicines; petroleum, salt and gypsum; cobalt for colouring glass a deep blue colour; feldspar for glazing dishes and corundum a hard mineral used for grinding and polishing.

There is a case of sulphur ore donated by the "Miners of 1912" and mica used for insulation purposes. Some of the crystals of mica hanging on the wall are of spectacular size, one being over 5 feet long. It came from the Sydenham mine near Kingston. Then there is soft, black graphite—the "lead" of our lead pencils, and tin and aluminium which remind one of the kitchen with its pots and pans. The copper case with its vivid green and blue ores portrays the life history of the "copper cent" and the gold case with its different ores and huge plaster model of a gold nugget called "Welcome Stranger," the original being found at Ballarat Australia in 1858. It is too bad it isn't real, for then Queen's at any rate could remain on the "gold standard."—Over at the side next to the arena we find "ripple marks" made by waves and turned to stone right in the rock and also "fossil raindrops" and the "footprint" of a giant lizard.

But now the hour is getting late and as the weary reporter wanders towards the door he is impressed by the great part rocks and minerals play in our lives. He can only find criticism of two points in the excellent arrangement of the museus. First, the model of a mine made of "old" wire screen situated in the north-east corner of the mineralogy wing is an "eye sore" and in the reporter's opinion at least, would be better "out". Secondly there is such a thing as "museum fatigue" and not a place to sit down. A few benches in keeping with the general architecture would be "handy". On the whole the professors of geology and mineralogy for many years past, deserve great credit for having gathered together by purchase and gift undoubtedly one of the finest collections of rocks and minerals in the world. Wander in and take a look at it.

He: "Funny step, hell. I'm losing my garter."

And now that another Arts Formal has passed into history, in the usual manner of Arts Formals, the air is clear once more, and we again announce the coming of a real Formal, a dance that is a dance, with an orchestra that knows how to play. Incidentally for the benefit of those who do care, the orchestra does wear tux's, and does know how God Save the King is played.

So take away your Large's and your Wrights, and make room for the one and only Billy Bisset, who at present, thrills thousands at Lucerne in Quebec. Many have listened and danced to his Terpsichorean fantasies and one and all have returned for more. For the uninitiated, he played for some time throughout the States, particularly at the Bamboo Gardens in Cleveland, broadcasting over station WTAM. He also made quite a name for himself at the famed Kit Kat Club in London, England. Victor had him under contract for sometime, and many of his records are still selling. And to come closer to Kingston, he is still considered the best orchestra that ever graced the platform in the Silver Slipper in Toronto, even better than the Genial Gene who was so well liked at the last Science Formal.

This is merely fact, if you don't believe what you read, at least believe what you see and hear. Buy a ticket to the dance, anytime on or after Wednesday, Feb. 1st, they'll be on sale for $6.00 in the Engineering Society Room in the Union, and then tell us whether we know what we're talking about or not.

Then there are the favors, if the orchestra holdeth not your interest at least the favors will, nothing like them before, and, we hope, after. Brush away your Mickey's and make room for these, they're worth keeping.

And then as always the dance has to be, and the tickets have to be sold so we have a committee, and a most wisely chosen one. Hereafter follows their names and telephone numbers. Not for the benefit of Levana, but for the mere male who desires a ticket.

Talk on Technocracy Continued By Forum

The second meeting of the Men's Forum was held Thursday evening. Last week's discussion of Technocracy was continued to include personal ideas on the possibilities of a technocratic government. The advantages already resulting from the technological survey of industry and energy on the North American Continent were thoroughly explored, and the benefits of an energy standard as compared to the present dollar standard were outlined.

Next week some ideas on social reconstruction will be the basis of argument.

BOXING COACH

JACK JARVIS

Mitt And Mat Men Are In Fine Condition

The R. W. & F. squad are hard at work getting in shape for the coming battles on Friday night at the gym. Coach Jack Jarvis has had the gang on the road and for the past week, they have been doing their best to be in the finest possible condition for the well-known acid test.

The Toronto aggregation are all veterans in the mitt and mat game and as a club are rated better than intercollegiate competition, but it has always been the policy of the coaches to bring the best available clubs.

Those who remember the Toronto meet of last year, will realize that they are really tough opposition for any college team, so the fans and supporters are assured of some sparkling action. The Peever-Carnegie bout is still fresh in the memories of the local fight fans, and the redoubtable Merve is again anxious to meet the best of the Queen city amateurs and prove conclusively that he is a match for any amateur in Canada.

The wrestlers will also meet more than ordinary talent when they clash with the West End "Y" of Toronto wrestlers, who are known throughout the Dominion for their prowess in the mat game. However Coach Jimmy Bews has been giving the boys plenty of hard work, not to mention a few new tricks by an old hand, and the writer believes the Queen's wrestlers will at least take the odd bout to win the meet. Friday night promises to see the best Assault of the year and indications are that there will be a capacity house and seats will be at a premium.

Student tickets will again be accepted for this major attraction, and everyone is reminded to get seats in good time, and avoid any disappointment.

E. G. Baker To Speak To Chemical Club

The fourth monthly meeting of the Chemical Club will be held next Wednesday, February 1st, at 4.15 p.m. in the lecture room of the Chemical Engineering Department, Physics Building.

A paper on "Submerged Flame Combustion" will be given by Mr. E. G. Baker. The use of under-water burners for heating and evaporating liquors is increasing rapidly and the paper ought to prove of great interest to Chemical Engineering students.

All Science students interested in Chemical Engineering are invited to attend. B.Y.O.B.

Sir. R. Falconer Discusses Educational Problems

Sir Robert expressed the opinion that the most pressing problems of education in Canada today must be tackled not by the Universities so much as in the primary schools and collegiates, where the curriculum needs to be directed with greater attention to selection and emphasis for the young student. Standards will be raised most effectively from below.

In this connection Sir Robert observed that this raising of standards to which so much attention is now being given is complicated by the position of the Separate schools. These constitute a problem of great difficulty in the way of any such advance. Sir Robert also remarked the present unsatisfactory condition which resulted from the imposition at Universities of Mathematics and Latin as compulsory subjects, and mentioned a number of prominent people of outstanding brilliance in certain fields who were yet unable to master one or other of these two subjects; French also was a stumbling block to many; and the opinion was expressed that the time and effort spent by some students in acquiring sufficient knowledge of one of the subjects which caused them especial difficulty, to reach the entrance standards required by the University authorities, was out of all proportion to the educational benefit derived from such study. On the other hand Sir Robert believed that greater importance should be attached to the writing and study of English; he stated that he believed from his own experience, that the memorization of certain passages of recognized literary value was of great benefit to the student, serving throughout life as a mould for diction and style.

Before he left for Convocation Hall Sir Robert informed me that many people seemed to labour under the impression that his lecture "The Lesser Antilles Revisited" was on an entomological subject. "When I explain its topographical character," he smiled, they immediately exclaim "Oh well, why don't you simply call it 'The West Indies'!"

the most beautiful city of the West Indies and boasts famous Botanical Gardens.

Sir Robert's lecture was illustrated by lantern slides. Of great interest were those of the famous Pitch Lake in the south-western part of Trinidad. It is one hundred and sixty acres in size and the depth has been estimated at two hundred and fifty feet. Asphalt has been dug from here for the past sixty years. The lake is probably the crater of a mud volcano. Trinidad also produces great quantities of petroleum.

Other very interesting slides were those of St. Kitts, Mt. Pelée, Port of Spain, San Fernando and others.

QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

E. J. Carlyle To Lecture Feb. 4 On Mining Topic

Noted Metallurgist Has Had Extensive Practical Experience

E. J. Carlyle, Secretary-Treasurer of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, will deliver a lecture before the Queen's branch of the institute on Tuesday afternoon, February 4th, at 4.15 p.m. in Nichol Hall. His subject has not been definitely announced, but it is expected to be "The Economic Side of Mining."

At 6 p.m. Mr. Carlyle will attend a dinner given by the final year students of Mining and Metallurgy, and at 8 p.m. he will give an informal talk on "Mining Life in the High Andes," at the annual smoker of the Queen's branch of the Institute. His talk will be illustrated with slides.

Mr. Carlyle was born in Woodstock, Ontario, in 1877, his father being William Carlyle, for many years Inspector of Public Schools for the County of Oxford. Mr. Carlyle entered the Arts Course at McGill in 1898, transferred to Science in 1900, and graduated in Mining Engineering in 1904.

He received his initial metallurgical training at Anaconda, Montana and later in Arizona.

In 1907 he went to Russia where he was in charge of a modern plant financed from London. In 1912 he made a brief inspection of the smelters at Rio Tinto, in Spain, and spent over a year in the Argentine.

Returning to Russia in 1914, he was for three years Metallurgical Engineer for the Sissert Company. Mr. Carlyle's work was of a most delicate nature, as it was during this period that the Great War broke out.

The confiscation of the property by the Soviets terminated the activities of Sissert Corporation in 1918. Returning to Canada, Mr. Carlyle was retained as Smelter Superintendent by the British American Nickel Company at Sudbury, Ontario. This was followed by varied and inter-

In a speedy tussle the Levana Hockey team finished their series of games with University teams, defeating Meds '38 by the score of 5-4. The Levana goalie, Marg. Line-ups:

Levana—Marg. McGregor, Dot Clemens, Jean Nelson, Jean Cameron, Jean Stewart, Marg. Chambers. Subs, Ruby Cordy, Carmel Milne, Lillian Ward.

Meds '38—Breckenbridge, MacIntyre, Legris, Forsythe, Simpson,, Polloch, Yuill.

Faculty Players Score Distinct Triumph With Presentation Of The Comedy "Twelfth Night"

Before an audience which taxed Convocation Hall Theatre to capacity on Wednesday and Thursday evenings the Faculty Players presented as their sixteenth public performance "Twelfth Night" scoring a distinct triumph.

Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night", or "What You Will" was written about the year 1601. The play is a vivid picture of human nature ranging from the highest to the lowest in rank, from the wisest to the most foolish — a delightful broken landscape of the world of men and women, full of love and laughter, fancy and imagination. Humor and romance are blended in perfect proportion. The humor is supplied by Sir Toby Belch champion of the ancient doctrine of cakes and ale, particularly the ale; the unspeakable Sir Andrew Aguecheek; the solemn prig and egotist Malvolio, smirking and pointing at his cross-garters; Marie Olivia's woman and the clown Feste. Romance is supplied by the beautiful Olivia and Viola and the handsome Sebastian and Orsino.

Dr. John Austin as Sir Toby Belch, Professor W. M. Conacher as Aguecheek and Dr. Frederick Etherington as Malvolio carried off the acting honors for the evening. Although the acting of the whole cast was uniformly good these three stood out above the rest and kept the audience in constant fits of laughter throughout the performance.

Miss Hilda Laird was perfectly cast in the part of Olivia and

Queen's Faculty Members Have Published Many Books On Diversified Subjects

Subjects Range From Physics To Poetry

By Connie Grant

A number of very successful books have been written during the past few years by various members of the faculty of Queen's. They deal with a diversity of subjects, ranging from text books on physical optics, to lyric poetry, and all are equally interesting.

Besides pamphlets and articles on historical subjects, R. Trotter has written two books. One, "The Canadian Federation" came out in 1924, the other "The British Empire Commonwealth has been published very recently. Both are clearly written, concise accounts.

Prof. G. Humphreys has added to his fame in the field of psychology through the medium of his two books "The Story of Man's Mind" which will prove interesting to the layman as well as the psychologist, and "The Nature of Learning", a deeper and more comprehensive work.

Mrs. Humphreys' "Twenty Sonnets" are remarkable for their beauty of language and delicacy of touch. "The Silver Flute" is perhaps her best.

T. K. Robertson of the Physics Department has written two books which in subject matter are a striking contrast. One, of a technical nature, is entitled "Physical Optics" and is particularly noteworthy because it is a middle course between conservatism and radicalism.

His other book, "Tayville", is of a different nature. It is a series of interesting sketches or episodes descriptive of the early days of Perth. Besides being in the nature of a history of the town it contains several clever and amusing character sketches, some of which are fictitious, others drawn from real life. Although published only recently, "Tayville" has proved to be very popular.

A few years ago Prof. J. Roy wrote a book of verse, of which the title-poem "Christ in the Strand" is perhaps the best.

Local Art Association Hears Dr. G.H. Clarke

Dr. George Herbert Clarke of Queen's University addressed the Kingston Art Association on Tuesday afternoon on the subject "Browning and Some Painters of the Italian Renaissance." He read several of Browning's poems and discussed the views of art that the poet puts into the mouths of the painters. The lecture was illustrated by reproductions of Renaissance paintings from the Douglas Library and from Dr. Clarke's private collection.

This lecture was arranged by the Kingston Art Association. The Association announces that the next lecture in the 1933 series will be given by Mrs. W. H. Fyfe. Her subject will be "Rembrandt."

Cast For Comedy Still Not Complete

No One Yet Selected For Ferrovius Part

The Dramatic Guild's production "Androcles and the Lion" playing in Convocation Hall Feb. 17th and 18th requires one more actor for the part of Ferrovius to round out its cast. In conjunction with this a Schnitzler play will be presented. Try-outs are being held this afternoon.

Among the better known members of the cast for G. B. Shaw's play are: Hazel O'Kilman as Megaera; Scarth Macdonald as Androcles; Lebo Ware in the role of Lavinia and Erskine Morden in the part of the Editor.

The others include Dave Malen —Lentulus; J. E. Gorman—Metellus; Bob Mahaffy as the Centurian; Joe Malen as a Gladiator; George Ault as the Keeper; R. W. Shannon—the Lion. In addition to these, a host of slaves, soldiers, Christian men and women will be required.

Rehearsals commenced yesterday afternoon. The executive wish to impress upon the cast the necessity of being on time as latecomers hold up the rest and make unnecessary demands on the director. A schedule of rehearsals will be printed in the next Journal.

This is a side-splitting comedy, inducing, sometimes, the laughter that is close to tears for Shaw aims his satire at conventionalized Christians, who under the power of organized society have departed from or never realized the original ideals of the founder. Like all reformers, of course he has been grossly misunderstood and it requires the best interpretation of his characters to get the play across.

The try-outs brought forth a large number of entries, and the judges had a difficult task.

Student Statue Breaker Appears Before A. M. S. Court For Trial And Punishment

A fine of $5.00, with an additional bond of $10 to be forefeited if he attends any social function held by any group in the University, was imposed on the person responsible for the smashing of the statue in Trophy.

This was the decision reached by the A.M.S. Court at a special sitting held in connection with this case.

Opening the case the prisoner pleaded guilty on the charge of disorderly conduct and breaking a statue in the New Gymnasium on the night of January 26.

The Prosecuting Attorney, Les Williams, pointed out that such disorderly behaviour was a common occurrence during this and previous formal decoration sessions, and that it must be stopped, or the Athletic Board of Control would refuse the students the use of the Gymnasium for their dances.

Mr. Williams then gave the details of the statue breaking, so far as known. About eleven o'clock the figure had been removed from the alcove where it formerly stood, and was garbed with various articles of clothing. At some later time, immediately after the statue was broken, the convener of the Arts Formal was informed and an investigation was started. In the eyes of the Athletic Board, the prosecutor pointed out, that the charge was a very serious one.

The prisoner had nothing to say, and at once the Chief Justice addressed the court before passing sentence. The action of the prisoner may be regarded as a prank—a silly prank—the Chief Justice believed, but it resulted in the loss of much valuable time by the several members of the Court, as well as others. Mr. Stamyar, the Chief Justice, believed that the fine imposed was light in view of the possible consequences, and that the prisoner was getting off easily.

Due to the tardiness of the janitor, the Court scheduled to meet in the Arts Building, had to be held in Carruthers Hall.

Science Formal Committee Plans Rapidly Taking Definite Shape

Expert Decorators At Work Nightly In Old Gymnasium

With only a week left until the Gym. will be thrown open to the merrymakers who will cavort to the strains of Billy Bisset's orchestra, everything is taking definite shape.

"Chuck" McKnight, decorator extraordinary, aided by members of the famed society has succeeded in converting strips of wood and rolls of paper into shapes fantastic and pleasing. And the old gym. once more resembles the innermost recesses of a bee-hive, with paint, nails, men, and even a little gentle swearing flying through the air.

The ever important "eats" are being cared for by Freddie Durdan, who, with the help of the Union staff, promises to satisfy the "inner one" to the best of man's ability.

The Business Manager is Harry Gilleland, who announces that tickets will again be on sale from three until five Friday (this afternoon), and also from eleven until twelve Saturday (tomorrow morning), in the Engineering Society room in the basement of the Union. The box for collection of the tickets will be left downstairs under the notice board, in the Douglas Library until three o'clock Tuesday afternoon, Feb. 7th. Be sure you hand back the larger stub of your ticket, with the name of your partner, and the rest of your party written on the back. This will facilitate the work of the committee in sending out the invitations and programmes.

The programmes will be of exceptionally pleasing design, and will list about twenty dances. They will be mailed out in the near future along with the invitations, so watch the lists in the Library.

Latest reports from Quebec state that Billy Bisset and his wonder orchestra to use a much overworked line of slang, "are rarin' to go," and eager to display their talent before the Formal revellers, as they already have done before King George, the Prince of Wales, and the Aga Khan, during their prolonged stay in London.

Anyone desiring a ticket and unable to be in the Union at the

J. M. Bell Discusses Currency Questions

Problem Created By Fall In Silver Price

At a joint meeting of the International Relations Club and the local Institute of International Affairs, Dr. J. Mackintosh Bell discussed the present position of currency in world affairs. Dr. Bell, a distinguished globe-trotter, has had close contact with leaders in commerce and finance, particularly in the Orient and in Russia.

One of the main problems facing the nations to-day is the downfall in the price of silver, Dr. Bell said. Practically all of Asia is, or recently has been, on a silver dollar basis rather than the gold or paper dollar which is found in the Occident. When one realizes that the price of an ounce of silver has fallen from over $1.50 to the current rate of less than 25c in a comparatively short time, it is not difficult to understand the disappearance of the purchasing power of the millions of the inhabitants of China and India who still hold on to their silver. The reasons for this unsatisfactory situation are very complex and date back to the abandonment of bi-metallism when silver dollars, as well as gold and paper dollars, were officially recognized and everywhere acceptable. Governmental action since then has played havoc with the market quotations of silver.

Partly as a result of the disorganized currencies, and partly because of the disastrous nature of trade barriers of other kinds, the people of the east, as well as of the west, are suffering from severe business depression. With over one-half of the world's population still clinging to its silver money but at the same time willing to buy goods from the other half of the world. Dr. Bell suggested that a rise in the price of silver might produce a beneficial effect. This could be achieved in many ways. Preferably, the silver content of our Empire's

Barbarian Garrulity

The people one meets may be divided with a reasonable degree of justice into two categories,—those who listen to what you say, and those who do not. And the former class can be subdivided into those who really want to hear what one has to say, and those who listen merely because they have been well brought up. On reflection, one is apt to arrive at the depressing conclusion that the former class is in both cases greatly outnumbered by the latter. We all know the type of conversationalist who delivers an unbroken monologue lasting half an hour and then gets up to go, saying "what a pleasant chat we have had." Such advanced egoists may be justly dismissed with some irritation: but how often do not we ourselves have the same motives, if not the same effrontery in conversation? It is curious that it should be so much more satisfying to describe one's own reactions to exams than to hear those of our friends: and that there should be no comparison between the interest of other peoples' influenza symptoms and our own remarkable experiences in that respect.

The wonder is that we ever learn anything new at all, when so much of our time is spent in trying to break in upon other peoples' conversation with a reminiscence of our own. There was some excuse for Jonah to insist upon describing his adventures, but after centuries of so-called civilization we might surely have arrived at the realization that our store of autobiographical incidents is just as yawn-making to our acquaintances as their interminable discourses are to us. But our barbarian characteristics persist, and we still labor under the illusion that an incident which seemed funny at the time will retain its humour indefinitely in reconstruction; nor has it dawned upon us that the name and parentage of our cousin's brother-in-law are quite irrelevant to the interest of the story.

There ought to be a lecture-course in the essentials of conversation, with special psycho-analytic tests to deal with our various forms of conversational ego-mania. It would probably result in the total destruction of our self respect, and the transformation of Society into a universal Trappist community, but there are occasions when one feels it would be worth while.

Letters to the Editor

It seems to have become a special task of the Editor's to remind his readers periodically, that while the Journal columns are always open to those who have something of interest to say, no letters will be published, which do not bear the writer's signature. The writer's name will not be published if he so specifies, but for reasons which are all too apparent we must know the identity of our correspondents.

Every day the mail brings to us unsigned letters. This is somewhat surprising in view of the fact that this is a direct breach of courtesy and that the writer is naturally expected to have faith in his convictions. It is well to remember that unsigned letters go to the waste-paper basket.

Erratum

Through an unfortunate oversight the caption over the leading editorial last issue read "The Miller Club"—the correct caption should have read "The Miller Museum."

The Aura of Fame

How far is the acclaim of the multitude a criterion of value?

Without a doubt, everything, whether social, political, ethical, moral, or literary is based on values. As Nietzche so aptly said, "Life is founded on continually changing evaluations."

It has become a commonly-accepted sophistry in our western civilization in the past few years that a man's value increases directly according to the number of times his name reaches print. This rather ridiculous conclusion is drawn, of course, from the supposition that the more valuable men reach the limelight.

Say rather, the more ambitious men. As Mark Barron writes in his syndicated column, a New Yorker at large, "Some time ago a certain journalist began to search for the present whereabouts of about 50 famous persons whose exploits were front page topics some 15 or 20 years ago . . .

"The journalist had his agents working in every part of the country and Europe. Yet, in the space of three months, they have been able to discover hardly more than half of these one-time celebrities."

"Fame is evanescent," as Schopenhauer said, and yet it is amazing to view the immense amount of effort that most people exert to gain a creditable reputation, say rather notoriety, in the minds of thousands of people of whom they neither know nor care. While our charlatans, scoundrels, and panderers to the public tastes, receive the acclaims of the masses, how fares the genius?

A few words from Remy de Gourmont, that master Epicurean and brilliant critic . . . "Every original genius is at first ignored or opposed by the mass of his contemporaries . . . In a democratic country one enters directly into fame, and the more cultivated the country is, the more widespread its average education, the harder it is to cut a way through the wall of indifference."

What price conformism?

There's A Possibility

To say, as does a recent writer for the Review of Reviews, that the motor car industry stands as the only logical agent to lead the country out of the depression must seem decidedly paradoxical to those who insist automobiles got us into this mess in the first place. Why, people who don't even know where the next meal is coming from drive cars and spend the money they need for food on gasoline.

But on second thought, perhaps that periodical writer was not so far wrong after all. The practical possibilities of radio, sound film and allied industries have been rather definitely exhausted; and television, although a promising invention, is yet too infantile to be entrusted with the responsibility of guiding the world to prosperity. Even airplanes which are furnishing noticeable competition to the automobile in the field of transportation cannot be counted on to furnish the universal convenience of their rival.

The motor car industry stands ready and waiting; its factories are fully equipped; all that is needed is the impetus to set the wheels of industry in motion. Isn't it quite possible, then, that if we were all to buy the auto that we've been needing or wanting the world could be restored to normal conditions? Perhaps.

Worried?

Are you worried about finals? If you are, you are probably one of those students who will make decent grades in them, according to a professor on the Hill. If you are not worried, you have a good chance to make either a poor grade or an absolute flunk.

The reasoning behind this theory is very simple. If you are not worried, is it probably because you know so little about the subject that you do not really understand how much ground you are supposed to have covered and how detailed and long the questions in the examination will be. Not knowing how much information you are supposed to have you will not worry about the little that you have acquired and consequently will make but little effort to cram any more.

On the other hand, if you are worried about your final in a course, you probably have a fair idea of the scope and content. You probably know how much you should have learned and will make some effort to cram a little more in before the tragic moment. Worry is a good mental stimulus for learning just a little more. And that more is enough to put you through and well on the safe side.

Chaucer Re-Englished

"Troilus and Criseyde," poetic novel written by Geoffrey Chaucer, has recently undergone its first translation from middle into modern English. This poem, ranking along with "The Canterbury Tales" in size and significance, has remained in its original form for almost six centures, a tribute to the ability of the author in the lines of romance and characterization as well as to the important part he played in popularizing the use of English, rather than French.

Translated by Professor G. P. Krapp, this novel is said to retain much of Chaucer's spirit and humor. Critics have praised it for closeness to detail, stanza by stanza. Modern idioms, expressions, and contractions have replaced Chaucer's quaint words to a large extent.

To the person who can read Chaucer as Chaucer wrote it, the translation, no matter how good, will probably be disappointing. There is beauty along with selfsatisfaction to be found in reading the original. It seems only proper to read; if we read at all, Chaucer's own way of telling of Troilus's love for Criseyde "and how that she forsook him ere she deyde."

THE OTHER SIDE

Woman in rags,
Holding a puling baby to her breast,
Thin and pale of face, hungry, and wrinkled, and tired,
Leaning against a door jamb, rotten with age,
Door ajar and a sickly smell within
Filtering foully out from dank and dirty recesses.
Man, wiping his mouth with the back of a filthy hand,
Wiping the beer, but not the stench of his breath, away,
Moustache draggling over his lips,
Foul mouthed, dull-witted, weak and degenerate.
Child, barefooted, with fear in his eyes,
Timid and furtive, yet quick to understand;
Dressed in a few shoddy rags and old beyond his years,
Reared in a city slum, man-made and God-forsaken,
Given a gutter to play in; starved of space,
And light, and colour, and beauty; robbed of love . . .
Progress.

brought beauty and poise to the role. She moved about the stage with the ease and grace of Ethel Barrymore and spoke her lines with perfect diction. Miss Clara Farrell as Olivia's maid was excellent. She played the part with a spontaneity and verve which delighted the large audience. Miss Margaret Fyfe in the difficult role of Viola again excelled and left nothing to be desired.

Dr. John Orr in the role of Orsino the duke of Illyria was splendid. Professor Leslie Law gave an interesting performance as Sebastian, the brother of Viola. His duel scene with Sir Toby was one of the highlights of the play. Dr. Macgregor as Feste, the clown, was most amusing, in fact his characterization was one of the most finished in the play. His singing also was good, especially his Epilogue song which was rendered without orchestral accompaniment.

Professors Smails, Jeffries and Stanley had minor but important parts and all showed considerable histrionic ability. Professor Irvine was good as an officer, as were also Mr. Joliffe and Dr. Ettinger in their parts. The parts of "supers" were played effectively by Misses Carol Cays and Ann Humphries and Messrs. C. Campbell, P. Alexander, C. Walker, and J. Conacher.

The most amusing scene in the play and the one that pleased the audience the most was the scene in Olivia's kitchen where Miss Farrell, Messrs. Anstin, Conacher, Etherington and Macgregor gave full vent to their comic abilities and covered themselves with glory.

The greatest credit however for the success of the play is due to Professor James Roy the producer. Comedy is the most difficult form of a play to produce. The producer must be absolutely certain of the desired effect and must further coach his actors to produce that effect. It is the producer who is responsible for the hundreds of details which are necessary to the production of a play. The success of "Twelfth Night" reflects most favorably on Professor Roy's ability as a producer.

One could not finish a review of "Twelfth Night" without remarking on the splendid costuming, lighting, and scenic effects of the play. The costumes designed by Mrs. Goodwin and executed by the Gates Studio were a feature in themselves. The lighting effects by Dave Jack and Les Williams left nothing to be desired. The scenery designed by Dr. Trotter and painted by Kitty Grant and constructed by Dr. Rose and his stage crew was excellent. If you haven't seen "Twelfth Night" don't fail to do so either tonight, tomorrow afternoon or night. It is recommended without reservations.

Back To The Bad Old Days Campaign Formally Commenced In This Edition

By Mary Fraser

Just for the sake of argument we went into a huddle with ourself the other day, and emerged with a regular brain-storm (not to mention a headache). Such racking of the brain has reduced that poor mass we fondly call our "mind" to a state not unlike that of a bit of mashed potato gradually assuming cinder-like proportions on a red hot stove. An idea out looking for a convenient home hit us right between the eyes. This is it: a series of articles re the naughty nineties and sech-like, as they were lived chez Queen's. All our aunts and uncles and the various other members of the family who boast of Queen's degrees have been making references to things like the Domesday Book and the A.M.S. Song Book and so on—things which we never knew existed. Maybe some of the "dear readers" have never heard about 'em either. As far as we can gather things were a sight more interestin' them days, so here goes for some of the dirt. (All profs. and other grads. who should chance to scan these columns take note: If some smattering of untruth creeps in which should be set right, by all means let us know—"we must have all the old skeletons intact" as far as possible.) And another thing—we most emphatically do not pretend to the slightest suggestion of coherence because the old cinder simply can't take it. Also, don't expect "prosodical perfection," proper sentence structure or good grammar. What's more we utterly and firmly refuse to be quoted, referred to or even read. But we'll guarantee more or less unsullied information—that is, as far as we can make it.

With these few words, we hereby launch our back-to-the-Bad-Old-Days campaign.

For the sole purpose of boring you to tears, we'll begin with the conventional outline of history. Now as far as we can see, Queen's was an idea, though not a College as far back as 1832. The Synod of the Presbyterian Church in Canada thought of it first, and forthwith decided that Queen's was a Good Thing. (Even though someone else had thought about King's College). They ruminated for about six years and then resolved that the general public should be let in on the idea; they began canvassing all over the place for monetary assistance. Help even came from the old country. We might mention here, that Mr. John A. Macdonald (afterwards Sir John) was one of the promoters of the scheme and incidentally the first to receive a Queen's L.L.D. In 1840 an Act of Incorporation (which never came into effect and was obviously a Bad Thing) was passed under the name and title of University of Kingston. You see, it wasn't the proper thing at all to call it "Queen's" without Her Majesty's permission; and after some dithering about a Royal Charter was granted by Good Queen Victoria allowing the new institution for higher (?) (egad, how original!) education to be known as Queen's College, Kingston. The Great Seal was affixed on October 16th, 1841, which was from that day forward known to all Kingstonians and so on—as "University Day." First lectures were begun on the 17th of March, 1842, in a frame building on Princess St. with three students, two professors and one principal.

There seems no immediate need for entering into the harrowing details of all the financial difficulties and pint-sized Depressions the College went through in the ensuing years. Apparently Principal George Monro Grant, D.D., did more for the university than any of the others. He succeeded Dr. Snodgrass in 1877 and proceeded to put the place on a paying basis. His generosity, kind-heartedness, and zeal caused the students to build up around his name a halo of absolute adoration. Scottish lads came from Nova Scotia just to go to "Geordie's College." They sang songs about him, everyone thought there was none like him, and they finally erected by student subscription for the most part) the G. M. Grant Hall, so that his name would be perpetuated as the best loved of principals. That sort of thing can only happen about once in the history of a college—that a principal could receive the whole-hearted worship of every last man and woman in the place. One of the great disappointments in his life was the fact that he was unable to show off the college of which he was so proud to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of York (our present rulers) on the occasion of their visit to Queen's in 1901, when they laid the corner-stone of the New Arts Building. Their Highnesses visited him in the hospital where he had lain ill for some time.

The history of the College is reviewed in the bound copy of the Queen's Journal, 1901, of which a copy can be seen in the Treasury Room at the Douglas Library. While looking through this we found that there was in existence a real honest-to-gosh song-book called the "Queen's University Song-Book" which was published in 1903 by Whaley, Royce & Co. of Toronto. A committee of the A.M.S. chose the song, all kinds of 'em from "God Save the King" to "A Copper and a Nickle." And do you remember that song Will Rogers whistled in "Too Busy to Work" called "Kingdon Coming," about Jubilo and so on? Well it's there too. And we'll bet our bottom dollar there are mighty few of the students here now who can sing "By the Old Ontario Strand" or "Landlord, Fill the Flowing Bowl." The only College song we've ever heard around here in "Queen's College Colours" which comes out of its dusty attic corner only on the occasion of a rugby game, and even then is sung so feebly that the Varsity "Blue and White" or "James McGill" shame it off into a wavering whisper. (Well, maybe we've forgotten the "Old Beer Bottle" at that.) When George Ketiladze writes a perfectly good Queen's song that would make the "Blue and White" turn green with envy, what happens to it? They sing it madly for half an hour at a Frosh Pep Rally of Arts '35 and then forget the whole thing. And mind you, we aren't special friends of George, in fact we don't even know the man, but the fact remains that it's still a good song, and might be dug up again and really adopted.

What's become of the Queen's Song-Book? As far as we can see, the only copy extant lies in the Treasury Room at the Library, where it merely accumulates dust. Maybe Bob Warmington has an old copy around his stor. Let's get a singing urge some of these days and see what happens Everybody enjoys singing; only there aren't enough people who'll admit it.

Letters to the Editor

Miller Hall.

Dear Mr. Editor.

Like a number of other Science men, I was unpleasantly surprised to read the "Steam Shovel" columns in the last issue of the Journal, in fact I am still astonished that you saw fit to publish it.

It was my impression that the "Steam Shovel" was usually directed to topics connected with the Science Faculty. In the past these articles may have erred in breadth of humour, but rarely, I imagine, by displaying such poor taste as was the case last Tuesday. Is it necessary to advertise so outstanding a feature of the Queen's Calendar as the Science Formal by poking fun at one of the functions of another faculty? The Science Formal stands on its own merits, and cheap criticism of other At Homes will not help its sale of tickets, or bring any credit to the Faculty itself.

Especially is exception to be taken to such deprecatory remarks — which would be in questionable taste anywhere—when they are contained in columns officially given over to the Science Faculty. Perhaps the publicity agent of the Dance Formal Committee has some explanation to offer?

Yours, etc.,

A. MINER.

Dear Sir:

Might I have the privelege of a few inches of space to comment on the material in the Steam Shovel column in the last issue.

I was very sorry to notice that the writer, a Science man, found it necessary to boost the sale of Science Formal tickets, by knocking the Arts and Medical Formals.

Now Science always stage a mighty nice Formal, quite often the best of the three. I think Arts and Meds are amongst the first to admit that. But Science are not good enough to knock other dances, and the writer showed a very poor spirit in so doing. Let him criticise the other Formals if he wishes, but he should not use his disparaging remarks to further the sale of Science tickets. It isn't cricket, egad.

Just a Student.

Mr. Editor:

As a word of explanation of the assertions and insinuations appearing in the "Steam Shovel" in your issue of January 31st, 1933, may I say that these columns express individualistic opinion and do not necessarily represent the concensus of opinion of the Engineering Society or the Science Faculty in general. As they are not censured by the Society but are left to the discretion of the Associate Editor in charge, it is not for us to apologise but we sincerely ask those offended, if any, to accept this letter of explanation.

We truly appreciate journalistic effort by members of the faculty and fully understand how one may be carried away by enthusiasm, also the often undue criticism received by those showing their interest in the faculty but we do not always agree with personal and individual criticisms.

The Engineering Society,

S. Parkes.
President.

COLDS

The common cold is one of the least understood and most misunderstood of diseases. It is very appropriately named common, and very inappropriately named cold. However, the not unnatural belief that the infection is a direct result of lowered temperature has been universal for ages. The ancient Roman said "fregus accepi" and the modern German says "ich habe mich erkältet." Personal experience has proven to the layman's satisfaction that he "catches cold" by being chilled, and scientific evidence seldom changes his viewpoint. And yet explorers and others who brave the rigors of polar wastes never catch cold unless brought in contact with carriers from outside. They may lose a few ears or toes from frostbite, but they are safe from colds so long as they evade civilization and its products. The fact is that the unnamed virus responsible for the infection produces as a prodromal symptom an uncomfortable chill. The local inflammation is usually the result of secondary infection and is usually accepted by the victims as the cold proper. The recent chill is remembered and set down as the cause of the cold, whereas it was really the first stage of the disease contracted some hours previously.

Mothers have always believed, may always believe, that a child must be protected from low temperatures. The abolition of red flannels, colloquially known as the four month itch, brought partial emancipation to millions of defenseless minors, but the cocoon wrapping system persists. Children contract colds by direct infection, when weakened by improper diet and temperature regulation, and are taught that their sickness is due to cold. The idea clings. The child is the father of the man, and any normal man believes what his grandmother taught him in childhood rather than what science and common sense tell him in his maturity.

Colds are spread by "droplet infection" from coughing and sneezing carriers, by infected table utensils, handkerchiefs and other articles in every day use. Hand to mouth infection is common, as is that by the mouth to mouth route. Kissing, and especially the promiscuous kissing of helpless infants, has been strongly denounced, but colds are preferrable to life without osculation, and provided the deed lie not too far reaching in its execution and effects, it is a risk that most of us are willing to incur.

Studies of the incidence of catarrhal infections in college students have shown that men students have twenty-three per cent more colds than women, probably because of, rather than in spite of the fact that women dress more lightly. It is now generally accepted as true that heavy clothing lowers resistance and opens the way for respiratory infections. Adequate coverings are necessary for those exposed to the Canadian winter, but the adequacy of modern fabrics is greatly underrated. Uniform protection should be an aim constantly in view, and ventilation should never be free from interference. Uneven temperatures on various parts of the body surface disturb the neuzovascular balance and may be a predisposing cause of coryza. Outdoors the body may be subjected to very low temperatures with much less discomfort and danger than is caused by a misplaced draught in a heated room. The hideous practice of reading over someone's shoulder directs a stream of air down the victim's neck. There are seventy-six other things which might be said against this habit, but they do not enter this discussion.

A seaman who finds little cause for complaint in enforced duty on a windswept deck may be seriously inconvenienced by a draught from a porthole when he goes below. Not cold itself, but sudden change in atmospheric environment is likely to cause congestion of the nasal mucasa and consequent interference with the proper functionings of the defensive mechanism of the upper respiratory tract, the cilia and the mucous secretions. Some part of the reluctance with which students enter classrooms is undoubtedly due to an instinctive recoil from the prospect of leaving the free healthy outdoor air for the less desirable environment of the school building where dry dust and hot air await them.

The treatment of colds is, so far, almost entirely general. Aside from correction of physiological and environmental faults, one man's guess at specific treatment seems to be as good as another's. Vaccine treatment has been attempted, but the results have been variable. English public school staffs report very favourable results from innoculation of all students: after a similar experiment in the United States, it was claimed that the innoculated persons proved more susceptible than the those who received no treatment. One thing seems to be agreed,—that the results vary in different individuals. Standard vaccines may simplify the experiments. Some of the old-fashioned home remedies have stood the test of scientific investigation, some have been found entirely ineffectual, and some actually harmful. The time honoured prescription of a sweat induced by something like hot lemonade, a night's sleep under plenty of coverings, and a morning purge is frequently effective. Alcohol has been widely advocated and employed as a specific, mostly by those who believe that in spirituous liquor is a convenient and desirable panacea for all the ills to which the human race is heir. The results are such as to sustain the belief that the entertainment of the demon rum is best reserved for a time when one is healthily capable of appreciating his antics.

Time, and a long succession of transfers in verbal form have served to disguise the truth in the sound adage which once said, "If you are fool enough to feed a cold, you will have to starve a fever as a result." The widely misunderstood modern abbreviation, "feed a cold and starve a fever," leads frequently to an aggravation of symptoms by improper home treatment.

In many cases colds are the result of digestive disturbances. Excessive eating during periods of sedentary occupation, and careless choice of food at any time, result in overloading of the enteric canal and frequently to relative stasis of its contents. Such conditions predispose to respiratory as to other infections, and no amount of local treatment can be effective while they persist.

Jerome said that "a man's love is the result of a full stomach." Other troublesome diseases apparently follow that condition.

—T. R.

"Harden your child to endure sweat and cold, the sharpness of the wind, the heat of the sun and the hazards he must learn to despise. Withhold from him all pampering in eating and drinking, in clothing and in resting. When I was a child, and now in age, I have ever judged and believed the same."

—Montaigne.

Dr. J. M. Bell Discusses Problems Of Currency

"small change" could be raised and, in addition, silver could be bought by governments as further backing for their gold notes. Constructive action of this kind would remove the cloud at present overhanging the silver market and an improvement in trade could be expected. The Orient stands ready to buy from other countries as soon as their money is accepted under more favourable terms than at present.

Many conflicting factors must be considered. The larger Chinese banks are making huge profits by speculating in silver and naturally do not desire a change. In the United States the agitation for the remonetization of silver is being backed by the silver mining interests and the whole movement in that country has been branded as purely selfish. Even the Governor of the Bank of England is firmly convinced that a return to "gold money," where a paper dollar is interchangeable for a gold dollar, is the only practical solution.

A few hecklers, in the form of commerce graduates and professors, in addition to a few would-be debaters who insisted on pumping information from the speaker on the Manchurian situation, helped to enliven the proceedings. Dr. Fyfe acted as chairman and Prof. D A. McArthur as secretary of the meeting.

Examinations are given in all courses at the end of a four weeks period at the University of California. If a student gets a mark of A for the preceding weeks, he need no longer take the course and receives a rebate of $5 on his tuition.

A special telephone system has been installed between the men's and women's dormitories at Antioch College in the hope of promoting better and increased social contacts.

Reporter Interviews American Humorist

Ring Lardner, humorist, radio critic, and authority on the American language, granted an interview to a Princetonian representative during the holidays in his famous retreat at "No Visitors," New York.

Access to the sanctum was gained only after a large bribe had obtained the password and the representative had passed through three ante-rooms, each of which had an intimidating notice on the door. The first read "No Visitors," the second "Absolutely No Visitors," and the third "Beware of the Dog." As the interviewer began the perilous passage, he noted with interest that there were two persons in the outer room, six in the middle room and a veritable crowd staring doggedly at the third sign.

"Why do you keep yourself so secluded, Mr. Lardner?" asked the interviewer.

"I want to be alone," said Mr. Lardner. "I have to think."

"What do you think about?"

"Many things," said Mr. Lardner. "I think about modern lyric Wons' scrap-book and Huey Long. Sometimes I think about the increasing rarity of the African bongo. Betty Compton's memoirs, autograph collectors, modern baseball and Radio City. Occasionally I think about the lack of leadership and organization in the Democratic Party and not infrequently about the lack of organization and leadership in the Republican Party."

"Mr. Lardner," said the representative, "I have read your stories with interest for a number of years. Why have you never written a novel?"

"The answer is simple. Before I had finished the first chapter I would be even more tired of it than the reader would. And that," he added, "is saying a great deal."

Mr. Lardner then turned to the subject of modern entertainment. "It seems to me," he said, "that each branch of entertainment seems to be conspiring to lower the public taste. I don't know what is the most inefficiently run business in the country today, the writers, antique collectors, the theatre, the moving pictures, or the radio, but I think radio is leading the league at the minute."

This remark prompted the interviewer to ask him how he liked his new profession, that of a radio critic.

"It's simply wonderful," replied Mr. Lardner. "It puts me in contact with the most interesting people. The Boswell Sisters sent me their pictures and Tony Wons has sent me two of his books."

The Theatre

AT THE CAPITOL

ROCKABYE
with
Coulance Bennett, Joel McCrea and Paul Lukas

"Even the best producers make a pill now and then," Tommy believes. This remark just about sums up this latest flicker of la Bennett. It has little, in this reviewers opinion, to recommend it, but surprising as it may appear, we have gossipped with several people who thought it was a rather amusing picture. So there you are — you may or may not like it. That's what others are doing.

The flimsy story depicts a period in the life of a slightly used actress who despite everything to the contrary has a heart of gold beneath her chic closely-fitting gown.

She tries to outlive her past, but it is always creeping up on her in the shape of Al Howard, a Jimmy Walker 1933 model

She adopts a child but the Welfare League won't let her keep it. She can't have anything her own way for when she chooses a new play for her next vehicle her manager (Paul Lukas) will have none of it, and threatens to leave her—(Of course you know all the time he wouldn't do that.)

She does the play, and enjoys an instantaneous success. But is she happy? No! She's lost her heart to the author, Joel McCrea.

To demonstrate that the wages of sin is death, she pays and pays. So Joel McCrea just had to be married, and the proposed divorce has to be patched up when Joel becomes a father. Strong-hearted little Connie Bennett faces this new ordeal valiantly, and turns to Paul Lukas for support.

The picture does at least one thing for Connie—it gives her a decided lead in her race with Lilian Tashman for honors as the best dressed woman in Hollywood. B—.

AT THE TIVOLI

WILD GIRL
Charles Farrell, Joan Bennett, Eugene Pallette.

The lovers of Brett Harte's widely read stories will find "Wild Girl" the screen version of his "Salomy Jane's Kiss" a great disappointment. In addition to the fact that Hollywood rarely releases a picture in which actors interpreting southern characters play their roles convincingly, the pitiful miscast of Charles Farrell and Joan Bennett is so apparent that this film which might easily have been as interesting as Harte's stories, is horesome and in many ways, rather stupid.

Eugene Pallette, playing the part of a coach driver does exceptionally well and his blustering geniality livens the film so much that he might indeed be billed as its star.

It is very likely that Raoul Walsh's reputation as a director will suffer greatly because of this production as he becomes so careless that he allows tame bears to amble about in supposedly wild woods, and Joan Bennet to have a pretty, but artificial wave in her hair—all this in the prim seventies. Taking everything into consideration, the mere fact that his name is attached to this effort at all should prove injurious to him. C.

The Sea Tyrant by Peter Freuchen. (Translated from Danish by Edwin Bjorkman)
(Liveright Inc., New York)

"Suddenly she rushed at him and began to scatch him with her nails—streaks of blood appeared on his face. He raised a howl and hit at her with all his strength. But a single thought grew stronger and stronger in Molly's mind; 'Scratch away with your nails—a bear is the spirit that helps you.' And putting her left hand on the wound of his abdumen, she clawed at it with a drunken women's senseless craving for revenge." Molly is an Eskimo woman, a primitive barbarous type who under the transforming influence of civilization (civilization indeed!) reverts to the savage ferocity of her oriental progenitors. Hideous, this piece of description? Maybe so. But it is life in all its stark reality, brutality, orgiastic license, as it was in the windjammer days of the whaling trade.

Peter Freuchen writes of what he knows. For twenty years this red-headed Danish giant lived among the Eskimos. His first book Eskimos was a saga of the north, true, but a saga completely antithetic to anything that had been written heretofore about the sea. The genesis of realism lies in revolt from the unnaturalness, often untruth, of fallacious romanticism. And though this book may be stigmatized as a lascivious story, yet it is truth, truth perhaps stranger than fiction. For those who do not mind a little realistic detail I am sure it would prove interesting.

Dunco Keller hard-boiled, hard cussing, mate of the North Cape out of Boston is a tremendous character. He may be a little overdrawn because his exploits would do credit to a figure from Beowulf but one cannot help feeling an admiration for ihs sheer physical power and indomitable will. Next to Keller, Allinaluk, an Eskimo woman, is the most finely portrayed character. Her sentiment towards Keller is as near real love as is possible for a woman of such crude instincts and background.

But Sea Tyrant contains a great deal else besides. There is language racy with the idiom of the sea; vivid description of the hazardous aspects of whaling; narration of exciting experiences on ice-floes intensified with the poignant drama of human suffering, cold, hunger, thirst. There is murder, and insubordination. Through this smoke-screen of conflicting desires, emotions, hatreds can be seen the iron hand of Dunco Keller, driving, scourging his men into action. Here is an example of Mr. Freuchen's psychological description about a whale:

"Nothing was left but a dread craving to twist her body until she was curled around the seat of trouble (where the harpoon had struck). She wished to run away, but did not have the strength to follow any one direction. Then came a new blow—a noise as of a tumbling iceburg. Then weakness overtook her. She wanted to sleep, as if she had fed too heavily. Yes, she must have eaten too much—yes, it was sleep that came."

This novel is something different in the line of sea stories. Some writer has said that Conrad didn't know sea life; Freuchen's stark realism might appeal more to a sailor of the old school as a true picture of his calling. I should not expect those who delighted in Barrett Willoughby's charming tale of Alaska or those who enjoyed Mutiny on the Bounty to get much "escape" value out of this book.

B.W.F. MEET STRONG OPPONENTS TO-NIGHT

Tricolor Scrappers In Action To-Night

By "Scotty" McGowan

Tonight is The Big Night at the Gym. Peever 'et al' will trade lefts and rights with Toronto's classy aggregation of boxers; Hoskings & Co. will swap body slams and head locks with the West End wrestlers of the Queen City. It will be easily the most excitement seen in the gymnasium this year. In fact in certain quarters it is thought that there may be too much excitement for the Queen's fighters—well—maybe—perhaps—but "I hae ma doots". Any team taking on the Queen's men are going to know they have opposition, real opposition.

The feature bout of the evening will be Merve Peever vs. J. Ridgeway of Toronto. Ridgeway is absolutely one of the outstanding welter weights in Canada, and the genial Merve will have his hands full, but he goes best against a tough opponent—in fact he likes it. It is hard to get an opponent for the crack Queen's welterweight unless you get one with a string of K.O's to his credit. Ridgeway is just the man.

"Dynamite" Jack Ewen the newcomer who made such a hit in the last assault with Ottawa will trade punches with Art Good of Toronto. If Good lives up to advances notices, this fight will give the Peever-Ridgeway argument a close run for honors.

Jack MacDonald, the blonde lightweight will meet H. Braybook another Queen City star with a good record. This will be one for the books.

"Chuck" Woolgar takes on F. Quinton at 155 lbs. "Chuck" is just hitting his stride and should make it interesting for his adversary.

McGill, the Queen's flyweight will take on a tough man in Percy Coin, but should give a good account of himself.

"Jimmy" Peters who got the big hand in the last assault will box A. Hall—what Jimmy lacks in experience he will make up in enthusiasm, courage and natural ability.

All in all it looks like a real boxing fest. McGill, Woolgar, Peters, Ewen and Peever, all good game fighters.

As an added boxing attraction Cole of Queen's will take on Samwell, well-known local heavyweight boxer.

The wrestlers of Toronto West End Y need no introduction to followers of the mat game either locally or throughout the Dominion. As a club they are outstanding, and have few equals. They are going to get a big surprise, however, in Coach "Jimmy" Bews's galaxy of stars, Jimmy Campbell, R. Johnson, Carlisle, Henry Hosking and a new heavyweight, none other than the track and football star, "Abe" Zvonkin—and big "Abe" wrestles just the same as he plays football—all fight and no quarter. R. Burford, last year's intercollegiate wrestler, will exchange holds with a new comer who is hustling him for a place on the team in the persnn of "Fuzzy" Forrestburg, winner of the diving competition in the last swimming meet. So that the wrestlers are far from lacking in color. It would be impossible to attempt to prophesy which wrestling bout will be outstanding—they will all be good—just as good as can be seen in amateur circles in Canada.

The wrestling programme will be as follows:

126 lbs.—Burford (Q) vs. Forrestburg (Q).

135 lbs.—R. Paisley (T) vs. J. Campbell (Q).

145 lbs.—N. Seewcel (T) vs. R. Johnson (Q).

158 lbs.—"Sailor" Revell (T) vs. Carlisle (Q).

175 lbs.—H. Marden (T) vs. H. Hosking (Q).

Heavyweight—J. Burnett (T) vs. "Abe" Zvonkin (Q).

This will be the premier boxing and wrestling meet of the year and will suit the most fastidious—a real night's sport at popular prices, 25 and 50 cents, and students use books of tickets.

The bouts start at 8.15 sharp, but it would be well to be early and avoid disappointment in seats.

Arts '35 Defeats Seniors In Interyear Hockey Game

In a hard fought interyear hockey game on Wednesday morning, Arts '33 and '35 were forced to give up the struggle with no goals registered by either club. Forsythe and Champagne were the pick of '35, while Byrne and Wallace bore the brunt of the '33 attack. Each team flashed the red light twice, but the plays were called back. If these teams meet again, their supporters may count on a fast, clean contest.

Arts '33—Goal, Parsons; Defence, Byrne and Johannson; Centre, Wallace; Wings, Day, Davis; Subs, O'Neill, Storr.

Arts '35—Goal, Forsythe; Defence, Quinn and McIntosh; Centre, Hughes; Wings, Young and Booth; Subs, Champagne, Martin, Brown and Johnson.

SPORTS SLANTS

The Junior did not try very hard with Frontenacs as the opposition on Monday. They just couldn't get interested.

* * * * * *

And now hockey interest will lag until the Juniors see action against the winner of the group around Belleville. This playoff should provide worthwhile hockey.

* * * * * *

Basketball is the centre of interest right now and the coming of McGill promises to induce the largest crowd of the season to turn out on Saturday.

* * * * * *

This game should reveal just how good our chances are of finishing first in the race. A win over McGill would look mighty sweet for the boys.

* * * * * *

Will the authorities have a decent scoreboard erected in a conspicuous place for this game? Mr. Bews could arrange this quite easily.

* * * * * *

And you are not likely to forget the big boxing and wrestling show scheduled for tonight. This always packs them in.

Sports Views

If the sport fans do not like the assortment of dishes served up for their enjoyment over the week-end, they are far too hard to please.

With the Senior basketballers garnering the limelight, don't forget that the Tricolor also has a Junior and an Intermediate team in a tight race for honours. The Juniors are not going as well as Manager Joey Josephson would like, but he looks for an early win.

On Friday evening the Juniors visit the local Y.M.C.A. and this game should show them up to advantage. They have the material to go far in their group, and all they need now is a little encouragement.

The stellar attraction on the same evening are of course the return meeting of the Tricolor Senior Hockey team with the Kingston Frontenacs. Since the first meeting of the teams at the start of the series, the Tricolor improved greatly and then turned in a woeful exhibition against the Cadets which did not enhance their chances of taking the group honours.

The double loss Queen's have already sustained in the schedule promises to be a real hurdle to overcome, but they are taking no chances of slipping farther and will be in there with a flock of pucks to finish in front of Frontenacs. Wally Elmer has plenty of faith in his boys, and if they turn in the type of game they are capable of, Kingston will have to let loose plenty of steam.

If you are tired of the puck chasing pastime and have the odd hour or so to spare on Friday evening, Mr. James Bews, Mr. Jack Jarvis, Mr. Scotty McGowan, and the collection of heavers and sockers representing the Queen's B.W. & F. team and the Toronto West End "Y" will put on a show that should appeal to all fans.

Coming here with a splendid reputation the Toronto squad should provide the finest opposition Queen's will meet this year, and if you can believe Scotty, they will return to the big city with a lot of cauliflower ears and canvas burns on the back.

On Saturday evening basketball holds the fort with the Tricolor intermediates entertaining the local "Y", and later in the evening the highly touted McGill Intercollegiate team bowing to the fans. This should provide all the excitement a student should have before the Sabbath, so don't miss the big show.

With the completion of the local Junior schedule the Tricolor hockeyists will have to mark time until the Belleville team is finished and ready for action. With nothing at stake the Juniors did not extend themselves against Frontenacs in the final game and the latter took the struggle by a spurt in the last period.

Next Monday evening Gananoque are scheduled to play at the local arena with Queen's Seniors as the opposition. These two teams have not met this year because of lack of ice at Gan., and the boys who like hockey will want to see how they stock up against the Tricolor.

Junior Team Lost Game To Kingston

With the group leadership already cinched, the Tricolor Juniors took the ice on Monday evening, merely to fill a date and with nothing to inspire them, and lost to Frontenacs by a 6 to 4 score.

Both teams took advantage of the game to try out new players with a view to capitalizing on their services next year. Coach Elmer started McNab in goal and he turned in a fair effort, considering that his mates did not bear down as ably as they might have. Smith and Gibson formed the defence with Wing at centre and Bryden and McQuaig on the wings. Christie, Lewis, Bain and Rupert proved to be excellent subs.

It was rather expected that the battle would develop into a rough affair but the players seemed content to let old feuds die out. There were fifteen penalties, however, all for minor offences, by the vigilant referees Watts and Dougall. Kingston got eight of these.

The first period ended with Kingston one up, Queen's getting a goal by Bain, and Frontenacs getting two via Laird and Gordon. This period produced the slowest hockey possible with the players content to let the other fellow do the work.

Queen's got the only goal of the second period, tying up the score when Lewis netted one. Play did not liven up much but hard backchecking kept the puck roaming.

The last period was the best of the three and some real hockey was dished up in spots. Kingston forged ahead with a goal by Foreman, but the Tricolor came to life with a pair, one by Lewis and a second by Bryden. That spurt proved too much for their pep, however, for they could not or did not prevent Gordon, Foreman and Catlin bulging the string behind McNab in succession.

The teams:

Queen's — Goal, McNab; Defence, Smith and Gibson; Centre, Wing; Wings, Bryden and McQuaig; Subs, Christie, Lewis, Bain and Rupert.

Kingston—Goal, Aldridge; Defence, Samwell and Timmerman; Centre, Gordon; Wings, Laird and Guy; Subs, Catln, Foreman, Murray and Samson.

Now Aren't the Yalels Gay?

Co-ordination, teamwork, speed, and alacrity have apparently been abandoned as qualities which determine All-American football players. At least they have been abandoned by Miss Phyliss Doran, co-editrix of the Southern California Daily Trojan, as the standard by which she judged her recent "super eleven" made public recently. Her only requirement was "handsomeness" and with this in mind, she selected the following players: Lassiter, Yale, and Smith, Colgate, ends; Tozer, California, and O'Brien, Washington, tackles; Corbus, Stanford, and Summerfelt, Army, guards; Gracey, Vanderbilt, centre; Newman, Michigan, quarter; Zimmerman, Tulane, and Berry, Illinois, halfbacks; Christensen, Utah, fullback. —Yale Daily News

Brilliant Game Assured When McGill Basketball Team Meets Queen's To-night

McGILL

Montreal, Que., Feb. 2 (C.I.P.)—Coach Van Wagner's nineteen thirty-three cage squad seems to be as strong as ever and the belief here is that McGill will retain the basketball title for another year. Practices have been going on regularly since before Christmas and the team appears to be in excellent shape. The personnel of the team must by this time be familiar to all Queen's men for it is the same quintet that has represented McGill for the past four or five years. The captain this year is Mel Rice who teams up with Bob Calhoun, former captain, to form the defence. With the exception of Lewin, who is playing his second year on the basketball squad and comes from Dartmouth, every man on the team has had the captainey. The defence of Rice and Calhoun is considered one of the strongest in Canada. Jerry Lee will help them in their defensive duties. Lee played last year for the Red seconds entry in the local city league and is this year replacing Pat Moore as auxiliary on the Red defence. Moore has been compelled to quit the game due to the pressure of studies. The forward line is composed of Lewin, Smaill, Faulkner and Hammond. Of these Lewin is considered one of the best scorers in Montreal basketball circles and proved to be among the leaders last year. Faulkner and Smaill are well known for their work on McGill teams of the past several years. Hammy Hammond, red menace of the gridiron hardly requires any introduction. Last year he was one of two co-captains of the McGill City League entry and is seeing active duty on the Intercollegiate team this year at centre. There is of course the inimitable Don Young, spearhead of the Red football and cage teams since 1928. Young found it impossible to attend practices before Christmas but has been training assiduously since the holidays and right now he is going as well as ever showing great form in the last few games. For playmaking and deceptive passing Young is unequalled. Coach Van Wagner feels confident that McGill will repeat this year, especially since they defeated Varsity by so handy a score last week. The Red team has played thus far several exhibition games as well as their first Intercollegiate fixture against the Blue and in each case have won by margins of twenty-five points or more. The only game they have lost this year is one to the local Sun Life entry in the Montreal City League, losing by a close margin. At that time, however, the teams had barely assembled and lacked both practice and conditioning. The victory against Varsity last Friday night was McGill's thirteenth successive win in Intercollegiate basketball. They have won twenty-one games out of the last twenty-five played and intend extending their number of wins to fourten straight by taking Queen's on Saturday.

QUEEN'S

With one win under their belts, the Senior Basketball team has not let up in their training, but are striving to get into the very pink of condition for the important struggle with McGill tomorrow evening.

While Manager Finley is well pleased with the excellent game turned in by his charges last weekend, he realizes that the Red team from Montreal must be mighty strong, and that it will bring out the very best in Queen's to down them.

This doesn't mean he fears them. Despite the very decisive win they scored over Varsity, Finley believes that they will have to play the type of game the Tricolor wish, and that they won't romp through Bews and McLaughlin in any such careless fashion.

The game against Varsity showed the Queen's team at its best. With a reconstructed team, the fans rather expected them to be a little uncertain in their first start but such was not the case. They began the battle at top speed, playing cautiously, and never let up for one minute.

McMahon, Newman and Hallett gave as finished a performance as the Queen's fans have looked at in some years. They have speed to burn, combine beautifully and the opposing guards have to be on their game continually. How Newman consistently out-jumped the tall centre from Toronto way is a mystery but up he soared to take the toss as he pleased.

While the alternates were not used so frequently in the first game, the knowledge that capable men are ready to go into action must be cheering to the manager, and they have proved their worth.

Elsewhere the fans can read of the personnel of the McGill team and with the knowledge of their record of last year and their speedy start against Toronto, the gym should be filled tomorrow evening for what promises to be the crucial game of the series.

Queen's Wins Both Junior And Intermediate Games

Queen's won both the Junior and Intermediate E.O.A.B.A. matches against R. M. C. in the New Gymnasium Wednesday evening.

The Junior game began slowly but by the end of the first period Queen's had scored three field goals to lead 12-4. In the second period the Cadets rallied, and play was much faster. MacDonald of R. M. C. put up a brilliant solo performance in this half, scoring no less than six points. The final score was 20-17 in favor of Queen's.

The Intermediate match followed the Junior game. Queen's had much the better of the play in the first half and amassed a commanding lead. In the second period the Cadets fought back but were unable to come within reach of their objective, and Queen's emerged winners with 41 points to 28.

Truth About Probosces Is Made Public At Last

The nose is the most prominent human feature. It stands boldly out from the middle of the face like the bow of a battle ship, and while it is not handsome in itself, we have become so accustomed to it that a man without a nose would attract more attention than a violinist with a hair cut.

The nose is used to strain dust, dirt cinders and microbes out of the air before it is taken into the lungs, and also to extract the odors from the said air and submit samples of them to the brain for inspection. Owing to this last duty it is more enjoyable to have noses in some localities than it is in others. In the orange grove of California, a nose is a great source of pleasure, but on a trip through some back yards it is another matter. Like the ear, the nose should be fitted with check valves, so that it can be thrown out of gear when not desirable.

Noses vary greatly in architecture. Among the most prominent varieties is the Roman nose which is a stern uncompromising beak shaped like a ship's rudder. The "pug" or retrousse nose is firmly fastened on a great many people who would never think of specifying it in an order. It is a small nose which creeps down unostentatiously from the forehead and leaps joyfully upward at the southern terminus giving the owner a pert saucy expression, which may not coincide with his disposition worth a cent. The Grecian nose is noted for its beautiful straight lines and classic design, but it must be noted that men with Grecian noses do not run for office any faster than men with nondescript wind splitters. There are also flat spreading noses, weird wandering noses and large meaty probosei. Nature is very careless both in designing and affixing noses, and has managed to get 90% of them on crooked. Moreover many noses have defestive flues and are badly plumbed, causing great distress and grief to their owners.

Feet are the terminals of the human system, and cause about as much trouble to their owners as any other kind of transportation terminals.

Dr. G. H. Clarke's book "The Hasting Day" is well-known. Two of his best poems are the sonnets "Resignation" and "Hope", but perhaps the most appealing is "To The Memory of Toby."

Plan Presentation Of Canadian Chansons

The French Club is actively engaged in the preparation of a concert which will feature French and French-Canadian songs.

Announcement was released yesterday that the concert will take place on February 15th at 4 p.m. in Convocation Hall.

The program will be of a nature to appeal to everyone. The single part songs and unison songs have been carefully chosen and are now being prepared diligently.

In a conversation with a Journal representative, Professor Marcel Tirol said the concert will be presented by the French Club free of charge. This he believed would be a strong inducement for students to attend. Professor Tirol also stressed the excellent quality of the program, and expressed the hope that everyone would make the best of this opportunity to hear these French songs. The Journal representative also learned that Jean Fortin, Science '34, who has appeared in several plays sponsored by the French Club, would appear on this program, this time to sing some of his favourite French-Canadian songs.

Month Of January Not So Warm As It Seemed To Be

Contrary to popular opinion January was not as warm as the corresponding month in 1932 according to figures obtained today from the Mettorological Bureau of Queen's University. The normal temperature for the month of January taken over a period of years is 18.6 degrees; the mean temperature for January 1933 was 31.3 degrees; for January 1932 it was 31.9 degrees. The total rain and snowfall for last month was considerably lower than January of last year; .93 inches for last month and 3.46 the year before. The normal precipitation is 2.84 inches. The highest temperature recorded for January 1933 was 50 degrees as compared with 53 degrees last year while the lowest temperature was 3.4 below zero as compared with 4 degrees above.

Last December was a little warmer than December 1931. The mean temperature for the former was 29.9 degrees while for the latter it was 29.5 degrees. For December 1932 the highest and lowest temperatures were 52.2 degrees and minus 9.4 degrees respectively. The normal temperature for the month of December is 34.4 degrees. The highest and lowest temperatures for December 1931 were 47.5 degrees and 3.5 degrees respectively. The normal precipitation for the month of January is 3.22 inches. For December 1932 it was 2.56 inches and for December 1931 it was 2.53 inches.

Six Students Receive Valuable Scholarships

Six scholarships of $100 each have been awarded to students making the highest average in work to date, in first, second, and third years in the Faculty of Arts, according to an official announcement from the Registrar's office yesterday.

The awards, in order of standing, were as follows: Annie B. Brodie, E. F. Beach, A. G. Ward, Barbara E. Brown, D. G. Burr and A. W. Weston.

Miss Brodie, who will graduate in 1934, has an average for all work since registration of over 80 per cent.

Since they were not given on Matriculation in 1932, the Robert Bruce Matriculation Scholarships of $25 each were awarded on the results of the December examinations to first year students in Arts, Science, and Medicine.

The winners of these scholarships were: Margaret Fay (Arts), Gordon Fraser (Science), and George Brown (Medicine).

ARTS '35 MEETING

Arts '35 will hold a meeting this afternoon at 4 o'clock in the New Arts Building.

An interesting program has been arranged. The executive have at length been able to secure Dr. G. Vlastos, Honorary President of the Year to speak on that occasion, and it is expected that there will be a large attendance.

Among business matters which will be discussed this afternoon pride of place will be taken by the Arts '35 Year Dance, preparations for which are forging rapidly ahead under the direction of the convener. The dance is scheduled for February 14th, St. Valentines Day, and will take place at the La Salle Hotel.

Another matter that will be brought up for discussion will be the next Arts Society Meeting, at which Arts '35 will be in charge of the entertainment program. The committee in charge expect to have an announcement to make at the meeting.

Nationality Deserves To Be Cast Into Discard If It Cannot Serve General Welfare Says Prof. Trotter

Canadian-American Relations Discussed By Dr. R. G. Trotter

"Nationality as nationality is not necessarily either creditable or advantageous. In fact it deserves to be discarded unless it serves the general welfare. But we believe that ours can do so," declared Dr. R. G. Trotter in his lecture in Convocation Hall yesterday afternoon.

The growth of Canada in a variety of ways has made the United States aware of us as a nation with a distinct life and loyalty of its own. "In short their manifest destiny so far as it concerns Canada is not any longer as they see it, to absorb us, but to live next door to us in relations of permanent neighbourliness."

"In the eyes of the people of the United States, Canada has ceased to be a salient of European power thrust dangerously close to the heart of their domain. We no longer so obviously challenge their most deep rooted traditions. And so on both sides of our mutual fence old fears of one another's hostile or at least jealous imperialism are vanished."

Present boundaries between Canada and the United States are largely the result of racial and economic divisions based on geographical conditions. The disputes as to the boundary rested in British, not colonial hands. For this we must be thankful, for but for British diplomacy with the weight of the British Empire behind it, the settlement could not have been so successful, as Dr. Trotter showed from the history of the settlement of the boundaries of the Maritime Provinces and British Columbia.

Extension and speeding up of communications has ensured the survival of our "flimsily built" boundary line, but since the most thickly populated portions of the Dominion lie close to the U.S. border and also in close proximity to the active centre of the U.S. population, there is a constant interchange of goods, and ideas.

Because Canada is the only nation in the Commonwealth which is at the same time American, her opportunity for promoting understanding in Anglo-American rela-

Mathematicians Hear Prof. J. K. Robertson

Relation Of Physics And Theology Traced

"Physics and Theology," was discussed by Professor J. K. Robertson at the last meeting of the Math and Physics Club.

Man's questioning nature gave rise to science, his questioning the inner consciousness gave rise to theology and religion, the speaker said.

In primitive time the studies were mixed as is shown by the belief that stars fix lives.

Conflict resulted from any attempt to separate them.

The Greek philosopher: were criticized for saying that the sun and moon were like the earth, for they were believed to be the abode of divinities. In the early Christian period the press of theology developed a contempt for science. The Bible was sufficient text book. The Middle ages were marked by the persecution of Copernicus and Galileo, who proved that the sun was the centre of our solar, system, for the Bible said that the earth was the centre.

During the 19th century physicists aimed to explain everything in terms of mass, moving particles and energy. So successful were they that, some were driven to the atheistic view that our bodies are cause and effect not free will agents.

A host of phenomena discovered in the 20th century, electrons, relativity, wave mechanics can not be pictured, and are explained only by mathematical formulae. Some theologians wrongly concluded then, that physicists had wiped out any real world, leaving only shadows and symbols. Physics, however, is based on a world of measured realities, which cannot be so discarded, but this reality is not final for it cannot measure human motives, or beauty. There is another realm, with a Diety, where fundamental Religion has been untouched by science.

Jags At Bargain Prices Will Be Made Available To Students With The Blues

The first issue of the "Monthly Jag" a new undergraduate humorous magazine will appear on the campus shortly, it was learned to-day. The new periodical which will contain sixteen pages will sell for ten cents a copy and the publishers declare that this will be the cheapest Jag on record in Kingston.

Students who feel that they can write humorous short stories or who can compose humorous poems are asked to submit samples of their work to the editor of the Jag. These contributions should be mailed to the Jag Editor at the University Post Office within the next ten days. Articles and stories must be short and snappy. Long articles are not wanted.

A special feature which should appeal to the rabid Jig Saw fans of Kingston will be a Jag Saw Puzzle which the publishers guarantee will contain a novel surprise. A prize of five dollars in crisp new dollar bills will be offered to the first person handing in a complete solution of the Jag Saw puzzle to the editor within three days after the students get their Jags.

E. Baker Spoke On Submerged Heating

At the fourth monthly meeting of the Chemical Club, Mr. E. G. Baker presented a very interesting paper on Submerged Flame Combustion. Beginning with the history of the submerged burner he dealt in turn with its present day development and its applications to the chemical industry.

The paper was followed by an enthusiastic discussion. The use of the burner in its present state for universal application to the chemical industry was questioned, since there seemed to be no method of adopting it successfully without bringing the products of combustion into the flame.

Six Bouts Won From Toronto Invaders By Tricolor Fighters On Friday Night

Bout Between Burnett And "Abe" Zvonkin Was Replete With Sensational Wrestling

By "Scotty" McGowan

For the first time in the history of the new gym. an S.R.O. sign decorated the front entrance of the elaborate sports palace, on Friday night shortly after 8.15 p.m. More than 2,000 people were packed in to see the "sock and rock" artists of Queen's and Toronto West End do battle. The "sold right out" notice probably kept out many more enthusiasts. There is not even a shadow of a doubt that everybody in the "house" enjoyed the bouts, they were jammed full of excitement from the first to the last. Even the most critical connoisseurs of the manly art could find no fault with the brand served up. The B.W. and F., is fast becoming a major sport at Queen's, judging by the fine attendance at the last two assaults. The management wishes to thank the citizens of Kingston, and the students of Queen's University for their outstanding support, this season. Unfortunately all the events could not be carded as advertised, owing to the inability of the Toronto wrestlers to arrive in time. The car bringing them here broke down enroute, and the two men who did arrive got here by hitchhiking the last hundred miles. The others arrived just as the final event was over, and just too late to compete, nevertheless the wrestling was, as it has been all year, first class.

Queen's won the assault from its Toronto competitors by a score of 6-4 events.

Undoubtedly the outstanding wrestling event of the evening was Abe Zvonkin's sensational victory over J. Burnett, the Toronto heavy. Abe displayed all the color that was promised, going right after his opponent from the sound of the bell, lifting him right off his feet, and throwing him heavily.

Burnett was out for about five minutes before he could continue. Abe battled his experienced opponent furiously, and in about four minutes pinned his shoulders to the mat, thereby making it a convincing victory.

Beach and Yaffe, two Queen's grapplers supplied the action in the first event of the evening. Coach Bews seems to have uncovered a wrestler of ability in Beach, who secured the first fall in two minutes, and a few seconds later took the second and deciding fall.

Forsberg and Burford, put on the second exhibition, and brought the fans to their toes with their action.

Kennedy and Davoud Obtain Commissions

Announcement has just been made that Paul Davoud and Judd Kennedy, ex-Cadets and stars of R.M.C. and Queen's Rugby teams have been granted commissions in the Royal Air Force as pilot officers, and will sail for England from St. John on Friday to assume their new duties.

Davoud and Kennedy have been outstanding and versatile athletes. During their four-year course at R.M.C. both played on the rugby team, and it was in a great measure through Davoud's brilliant playing that the Cadets won the Dominion Intermediate Championship three years ago.

Kennedy, as well as being a prominent and valuable member of the R.M.C. rugby teams, was one of the regular defence men on the R.M.C. Hockey team which won the Intermediate Ontario Hockey championship two years ago.

Masefield Has Had Varied Experiences Ashore And Afloat

Kingston is extremely fortunate in having an opportunity of hearing John Masefield, the Poet Laureate, on February 15. The exact nature of his lecture has not yet been ascertained, but probably it will consist chiefly of a reading of his own poetry.

John Masefield was born in 1878 in Ledbury, Hertfordshire. He had only four years of formal schooling and, at the age of 14, was placed on the ship "Conway," to be trained for the merchant service. He was apprenticed to the captain of the merchant vessel for the fabulous sum of one shilling a month. He remained at sea for three years and in 1895 was paid off in New York Harbour. For a time he was engaged in farming in Conneticut, and later he became third assistant bar tender to Luke O'Connor, a saloon keeper. Masefields' duties were to keep the bar clean and to serve the beer and ale.

In 1892 he returned to England and for the next thirteen years held a number of varied positions. He was for a time connected with the "Manchester Guardian," and with the assistance of W. B. Yeats, tried his hand at writing. In 1911 the publication of "The Everlasting Mercy" established him as a poet. Like "Dauber", which appeared in 1912, it was greeted with a diversity of opinions, but was widely read.

Since that time Masefield has written novels, plays, a large body of lyric verse, and a number of narrative poems. In 1930 he was appointed Poet Laureate, succeeding the late Robert Bridges.

Gym Interior To Become Glowing Exotic Minaret-Spired City For Science At Home

"CHUCK" McKNIGHT

Imagine yourself transported in the space of a few moments by magic carpet, to some far Eastern city, let us say Bagdad, or any other Mohammedan city that your thoughts may conjure up. Imagine that it is night and that your carpet has come to rest just above the highest house tops, but still in the shadow of those slender and lofty minarets.

The moon is shining brightly overhead, everything is etched in silver and black, black in the shadows, but silver where the beams from the city lights stream up the walls of the myriads of minarets, which stand sharply outlined against background of the Eastern sky.

But hark, there's a variance; from the top of one of these Mohammedan towers comes the strains of western music. The carpet drifts closer, faces become clearer, we see beautiful white skinned damsels, and tall handsome sheiks in black and white, dancing o'er the tops of the squat buildings.

Closer still we come, familiar faces pass one after the other into and out of our view, the inside of a minaret opens before us, and then we understand the source of the variance. For there,

Technocracy

Technocracy is unquestionably one of the most discussed topics of the hour. It has engaged the attention of the college campus, and the open forum. It has furnished copy for innumerable magazine articles, and has been blazoned across the front pages of countless daily newspapers. What is this strange thing?

Technocracy is a Greek compound meaning rule by the arts or more properly government by technocrats. Technocrats are those individuals who have evolved "a new science of economics" based on a technological survey of American industry.

The history of this movement dates from the war years when a small group of engineers, alarmed by the tremendous expansion in industry and agriculture, began to gather data on industrial processes. Its moving spirit is Howard Scott, who first became associated with technocracy in 1920. In that year he joined up with Veblen, an economist, Steinmetz, an electrician, and Tolman, a California professor, to form the "The Technical Alliance." Thorstein Veblen's book, "The Engineers and the Price System" contains the basis of their philosophy. Briefly, Veblen advocated management of industry by technicians, aiming at maximum production of goods and services. He claimed the result would be a one hundred per cent increase in material goods.

That is their starting point. Technocrats claim that the depression is due to technological reasons. They point to the immense debt in the United States of $218,000,000,000 in amortized securities. Much of this consists of obligations in the form of bonds and motgages issued to pay for new labour saving machinery, a large part of which is already obsolete because of newer inventions.

They claim we have reached the end of an era and our path lies in either of two ways. Let industry continue to struggle under the burden of private profits to the detriment of human welfare, or else let the machine do man's work. They say that if America's technological resources were concentrated it would only be necessary for adults between the ages of 25–45 to work 660 hours a year to produce enough to maintain a standard of living ten times above that of 1929. Among other examples advanced is that a nettle fibre known as "ramie" is waiting the opportunity to displace pulp, silk, wool and cotton. "Ramie" they say grows 1500 lbs. to the acre, has a 22 inch fibre and can be harvested three times a year. And wonderful to relate it wears seven times better than wool. All this in spite of the fact that our markets are glutted with cotton, silk, wheat, etc.

This new form of economic planning, it is said, would make all resources available to the people. Unfortunately, they are not very clear as to how this would be brought about. There is talk of an energy currency to displace the gold standard. This new currency would be based on the annual production of energy and divided equally among each individual. But once again the how remains an enigma.

Perhaps the outstanding points against technocracy are the following—its generalizations are often hasty; many of its statistics are in error; its platform is by no means coherent and practicable.

Recently Columbia University, despite the fact that it was employing thirty-six scientists in an extensive technological survey, decided to call for Howard Scott's resignation, and has now carefully dissociated itself with the movement. Nevertheless technocracy is still and deservedly occupying the attention of thinking people and has lately crossed the Atlantic into Europe where is aronsing great interest.

Mind Above Matter

Dr. Alexander Meiklejohn, a profound thinker and scholar, has declared the university should be a place of the mind, and not a training school, as it is at present. The latter part of his statement is open to controversy, but there is no denying the veracity of the introduction to his remark.

Dr. Meiklejohn says thinking should be stimulated for two reasons. "First, it is pleasant. Second, it gives insight and perspective." How true he is. The real thinker is so in the minority today that those who associate with him realize a vicarious pleasure from his opinions and ideas.

Long a foe of technical training in universities, Dr. Meiklejohn frequently has declared that specialization is an enemy of education. And he is right. We must make a college degree a reward for intelligence and not for durability. Let technical courses be confined to schools for that purpose. A university must be an institution where people are encouraged to think. The world today needs thought and it looks to its universities to supply the demand.

We heartily agree with a prediction made several years ago with Glenn Frank, and look forward to the eventful time when it will come true. Perhaps our grandchildren will reap its benefits—

"I believe that the curriculum as we know it must go. A hundred years from now I suspect that little will be left of the rigidly departmentalized college that teaches a variety of separate studies."

—Oregon Daily Emerald.

Give Us Time

That is the plea so often heard. Students rush to classes in a constant frenzy trying to get in those last-minute assignments and cover the last half of the course in two class periods.

Instructors should realize how much work must be covered during the semester and plan to finish the course a few days before finals. Then the last class periods could be used for brief summaries of the work. In this way the students would have enough time to organize their work systematically. This last-minute cramming far into the night before each final would be unnecessary. There is another point in favor of this plan, too. The students would have an understanding of the course rather than memorizing a few facts for the final.

—Daily Kansan.

Jig-Saw Mania

The human mind in its endless and diverse ramifications is forever presenting new and interesting angles to those people who take delight in noting the peculiarities and foibles of their neighbours. The newest thing along these lines is the mania for jig-saw puzzling which is sweeping this particular section of the world and, we are given to understand, most other sections of the world.

The origin of the jig-saw puzzle is wreathed in mystery. While charles, the second, invented cards and the Chinese Mah-Jong, the originator or originators of the popular puzzles are unknown. It is perhaps as well not to carry conjecture too far along this line.

Jig-Saw puzzling falls easily into that class of pastimes which may be termed "self-tormenting." People who jig-saw are in the same class with those who delight in solving a detectives mystery two pages ahead of the author or those who spend hours twiddling two bits of iron in a fruitless endeavour to separate them from an ingenious knot in which the manufacturer of this little plaything has involved them.

The exact value of jig-saws in the training or development of the mind is a matter best left to psychologists but it seems to us that the same effects could easily be obtained in a manner somewhat more instructive and probably more amusing. The mere fitting together of two curiously shaped pieces of cardboard is not a matter requiring much more than average eyesight and the grouping of colors which usually precedes the solution of the expert falls within the same category. A monkey of average simian intelligence should be able to piece a picture of this sort together after the use of a little patience in the training of the animal.

We may conclude perhaps, that jig-saw puzzling is excellent diversion for those who have nothing better to do or for those who have not the intelligence for higher things. The first classes must be exceedingly small. The size of the second may be judged from the rapidly increasing incomes of those whose business is the manufacturing of these games.

—McGill Daily.

"Pipes"

At this same time every year, students start thumbing the pages of the second semester schedules in an attempt to find the so-called "pipe" courses. Every direction you turn you find someone with a suggestion as to an easy course, which incidentally often turns out to be quite the contrary.

Pity the poor senior who has taken all of these suggested courses and now finds himself in the predicament of having no choice in the selection of his studies. He now has to take classes that he has put off with the intention of taking them some semester when his schedule is not so crowded.

In the years to come, he will look back and see that there were no real "pipes," as his grades in these courses will probably show; but not until then will he realize that there "ain't no such thing."

SERGEANTS MESS

A general meeting of the Sergeants' Mess was held following the Saturday parade of the C. O. T. C.

Lt.-Col. Wilgar was heartily welcomed. He spoke of the need of a well organized and supported mess. He said the old saying was still true, "Show me a unit that has a good mess and I will show you a real unit." The N. C.O's: are the backbone of the organization because of their intimate contact with the cadets. He asked for their continued support.

Following the address the minutes of the last meeting were read and adopted. A committee was appointed to make arrangements for the mess dinner which will be held in the near future. Matters of a general interest were freely discussd by all.

The officers of the Mess certainly appreciated the splendid turn out and expect everyone to be present at the next meeting.

Dr. Vlastos Addressed Arts '35 Year Meeting

Dr. Vlastos, Hon. President of Arts '35 gave an interesting talk on Sophistication to a very well attended meeting of that year. Miss Marion Hayes and Messrs Archie James and Mel Baker reviewed the sporting activities up-to-date. Bill Gummer said that the program for the next Arts Society Meeting would be a Big Surprise. Ted Hughes, chairman of the Year Dance Committee emphasized the fact that Tuesday night, Feb. 14th, would be, "A very Large Evening," and in view of the wide interest which the St. Valentine's Dance has already aroused urged members of the year to buy their tickets as soon as possible to avoid disappointment.

CHEMICAL SOCIETY

There will be a meeting of the Queen's Chemical Society in the large lecture room in Gordon Hall at 3.30 p.m. sharp, on Wednesday, Feb. 8th, 1933. The speaker will be Dr. R. K. Stratford of the Imperial Oil Refineries who will discuss "New Methods in Refining and Utilization of Petroleum."

Dear Mr. A Miner (or it it "a minor"):

To say that I am surprised is to put it mildly. You, you say were unpleasantly surprised. I, to the contrary, am pleasantly surprised, to find that at least three people read my humble effort, yourself, Mr. Just A Student, and our honourable President.

But I am inclined to believe that you have a dirty mind, possibly more so than my own, and also that you have forgotten the contents of some of the earlier Steam Shovels. This, at times were a little beyond the pall, and if I remember rightly their one policy was to pan, or as you say, to poke fun at our Sister Societies, Arts, Meds, and Levana which may or may not have deserved it. And insofar as I can remember Mr. A. Miner never criticised them. Why then your closing paragraph, which with your permission I will requote, "Especially is exception to be taken to such deprecatory remarks — which would be in questionable taste anywhere—."?

Possibly, a little letter on the front page in the lower right hand corner, of last Friday's Journal, may have been the explanation you needed. If not I am afraid that that is all the explanations I am able to offer. The Steam Shovel to which you take exception was an announcement not an advertisement.

Yours, without the etc.,
Merely the Writer.

Dear Student:

It was with all the pleasure in the world that space was granted to you in the last issue. In fact we are only too glad to see that someone is interested.

If you will permit me, I will take exception to one thing you wrote. You say, "Science are not good enought to knock other dances." I claimed and still claim that the Science Formal is, has been, and always will be the highlight of the year. Arts and Meds have always admitted it. Think back, if that is possible.

Likewise has it never crossed your mind that most publicity agents always claim that their product is the best, to the detriment of other similar lines.

If this does not satisfy you, my honorable Student, you too might look back at last Friday's Journal.

Yours,

Still Merely The Writer.

Dear Mr. Parkes:

For your letter, I thank you from the bottom of my heart. If I have offended the Engineering Society I am sincerely sorry, and shall endeavour in the future to be guided strictly by their policy.

With these thoughts, then, in mind, I am,

Yours,

The Writer.

S. C. M. Shrapnel

A week ago some of the Queen's students interested in S.C.M. work were intertained at a week-end conference held at McGill. On Saturday evening a dinner was held in Strathacona Hall, following which an address was given by Dr. G. Vlastos of Queen's on "Religion with the Modern Mood." In this address and the discussion which followed Professor Vlastos laid the introduction for his address, delivered Sunday morning on "Religion Against the Modern Mood" and showed, in a very masterly, clear and coherent fashion, how some of the characteristics of the modern such as his sophistication, skepticism and tendency to objective thinking may form the basis for a workable, practical religion. More than that, these are but necessary steps on the road to a rational concept of God and His relation to the individual.

On Sunday morning Dr. Vlastos took the other side of the picture and showed how the modern mood militates against religion. The modern lacks a singleness of purpose and outlook, lacks unselfishness and faith to a degree that makes it extremely difficult for him to see far enough outside the very limited circle of his own immediate interests to discover anything approaching the true meaning or force of religion.

Taking it from all points of view and considering both the social contacts made and the stimulus to personal thinking on matters pertaining to religion given by the addresses and discussion groups, one must admit that this week-end S.C.M. conference at McGill was a complete success.

Inquisitorial Committee Checks Student Affairs

Berkeley, Calif., Jan., 24—(Special)—Seniors in activities, fraternities, and honor societies, fell with the non-organized before the Student Affairs committee during a recent inquisition of the past semester. Fifteen cases involving more than 20 students, many being athletes, and some holding responsible campus positions, were brought before the committee and charged with cheating in some way or another during the fall semester.

The 16 offenders who were found guilty were given sentences varying from expulsion and suspension from the school, to simple censure which constitutes a first warning, and full censure which prohibits the students from participation in campus activities, and places him on probation.

The following are a few of the cases which were brought before the Student Affairs committee:

A non-organization sophomore accused of attempting to bring a loaded "blue book" into a Physics 2A final examination. His sentence was reprimand by dean of undergraduates and full censure for the remainder of his residence at the university.

Indiscriminate matter in student publication. Editor informed of sole responsibility of the publication and warned against recurrence.

A junior accused of copying from the book in Zoology 1A mid-semester examination, was found not guilty.

Breach of good taste in an honor society initiation brought about the sentence of an apology to the persons involved.

Violation of campus social rules by a student organization. The president was held responsible, and sentenced with reprimand and warning against any repetition.

A senior of mature age was found guilty of selling problem sets. He was referred to the dean of undergraduates.

A junior fraternity man who was out for sports was charged with tearing a name off of another's examination paper in economics, and handing it in for his own. He was found guilty and sentenced to full censure for the remainder of his time at the university.

Well Prepared Talks Given At Civils Club

At a meeting of the Civils Club held in Cairuthers Hall the members were treated to two exceptionally well prepared talks by two third year men.

Chairman Tiny Elliott first called on "Gus" Scroggie who described various causes affecting concrete deterioration under the heading, "Durability of Concrete." He showed how these various causes afforded points where efforts are concentrated in experimental work devoted to further increasing the lasting qualities of this essential constituent of modern structures; and went on to describe measures adopted in modern construction to reach a higher degree of permanence in concrete work.

H. Paterson, the second speaker, introduced a topic of interest in "Prevention of Industrial Accidents." He told how modern systematic accident prevention originated from a "pass the buck" process practiced a few years ago in large concerns. In citing examples around the University of hazards whose existence is contrary to the policy of the new field of Safety Engineering, he showed how little things go unnoticed until someone is injured. In closing he pointed out that the education of employees to necessity for constant care, and the power of example set by the employer were the prime factors in establishing a feeling of confidence in the workman eliminating accidents and in ultimately increasing plant efficiency.

BOOK KIDNAPPER

New Orleans—Allen Johnson, 24, former philosophy student at Stanford University, confessed today the first "literary kidnapping" on record here. Johnson was in jail charged with "abducting" the "Life of Julius Caesar," written by the Emperor Napoleon III, from the public library here.

The books were taken Jan. 6 and a note left in their place saying they would be returned for $1500 ransom and directed the library to advertise in the newspapers for return of the books.

An advertisement placed Jan. 22 brought 11 responses, but it was not until last night that police were able to trace the telephone calls from the person saying he had the books. The library held the wire for 15 minutes while police traced the call. Johnson was arrested and the books returned to the library.

Adding to the Arts

Strong back, shovels, coal and a furnace are laboratory requirements for two new courses at the University of Iowa. Residents who employ university students have complained that the youths know little of furnace technique. So President Walter A. Jessup has announced courses in anatomy and digestion of the furnace, with practical demonstrations in the Kellogg dormitory boiler room.

EINSTEIN FORGETS

In one chapter of Charlie Chaplin's new book, which is still unfinished, he tells this story about Professor Einstein.

Chaplin was out driving with Einstein in Berlin when the latter forgot his own address. He remembered, however, what his house looked like, and the driver tried to locate it from his description, but in vain. Finally, after a long and tiring search, it occurred to Charlie Chaplin to inform the cabby who his absent-minded companion was.

"Oh, Professor Einstein!" exclaimed the driver with a smile of recognition. "Everybody in Berlin knows where he lives!" The professor grinned. "Everybody knows but Einstein!" he admitted sheepishly.

Guild Play Postponed

Because of demands made on the Dramatic Guild in preparing for The Drama Festival, it has been decided to postpone "Androcles and the Lion" and the Schnitzler play until that event is over. This was the announcement made by the directorate yesterday.

At Kentucky University the funny papers are being filed in the library so that the students may read them.

Exercise

Exercise is work scientifically performed, so that the worker supposedly derives benefit without producing anything. Swinging an axe with the object of obtaining firewood is work; the performance of the same action in a turtle-neck sweater by a gentleman who never uses wood except in moments of deep thought, is conditioning exercise. Exercise is variously prescribed and proscribed by experts as an aid to health, and health has been attained both with and without it. It has become evident that physical work affects different individuals in different ways. Anatole France declared that for forty years he performed no more energetic action, daily, than walking to the bottom of his garden and back, but many people would die of acute congestion of everything after a few months of such a system. It may be said that some of us are born to work, a demented few pursne work, and a great majority have work thrust upon them.

Normal children cannot be prevented from exercising. If the total energy voluntarily expended daily by the children of any large city could be applied to the business end of a shovel, a million coal-heavers would join the unemployed — if it could be. The tendencies of childhood persist in adult life, often in a heart-breaking degree, and it is usually found that adults will perform really energetic movements only when they cannot possibly lose their amateur standing as a result.

It has been remarked that barbers show surprising good health in spite of the sedentary nature of their occupation. The gentleman who said this, O. O. McIntyre we believe, did not take into account the fact that no little expenditure of energy is necessary to keep the body in an upright position, to say nothing of the effort required to hold the arms almost constantly abducted at the shoulder, and the organs of speech constantly active. Barbers are among our hardest working people.

Except in a position of absolute repose, the individual is constantly consuming tissue. The simple actions of our everyday life necessitate an amount of work that most of us believe quite sufficient. There are many people who believe that it is impossible to exercise in a rumble seat, but they are completely mistaken. The mere actions of entering and leaving the appartatus may not be performed without considerable muscular effort. Benefit may be derived from many other activities in which young people engage without any idea of profit. Dancing, for instance, is one of the best known exercises. The firm jaw and tense expression of the senior student may he due to hereditary character, but is more probably the result of his masterly disposal of the beef offered him in some Kingston home away from home. Such material requires powerful mastication at times, but the will to overcome is strong in these young men. Their jaws never tire. After the necessary work of the day is done they may often be found voluntarily chewing the fat in Ban Righ from sheer love of effort.

Exercise is used as a weapon in the bitter combat waged by degenerate moderns against adiposity. The "bends," so greatly feared by divers and matrons, are accepted as the lesser of two evils when the enemy begins an advance on the central front. But the reduction of excess weight by increased activity is an extravagant process. Forced draught to an overloaded furnace cannot replace proper alimentation and limited fueling as a clearing system. In most cases overweight is the result of over-ingestion, and strenuous exercise for the purpose of reducing is futile and may be harmful.

So far nothing has been said about the exercises demanded by professors, and perhaps the less said about them the better. These are not properly exercise at all, since in many cases they distinctly resemble productive work, and so do not concern us at the moment.

On Physical Trainers

Dr. L. P. Jacks in "The Lancet," We made a mistake in entrusting physical culture to people of inferior education. They ought to be people of high education—as they are in Sweden, for example. They ought to know that the human body is not merely a machine for digesting food and circulating blood and developing muscle, but a marvellous creative instrument, a thing that hungers for skilful activity in every nerve and fibre of it, so that even its physical health is not attainable until you have satisfied its hunger for skill by one means or another. Your drill-sergeant, your muscle trainer, your professional gymnast, your football coach may be good fellows enough for their business; but as exponents of physical education, may the Lord deliver us from all such!

Lois Moran Interviewed

"An interview? Sure I'll give you an interview! But don't expect any sensational or surprising statement for the press—I've used up all my startling publicity statements long ago," was the smiling greeting of Lois Moran, who is now starring in the Broadway musical comedy "Of Three I Sing," when approached by a representative of the Princetonian in her dressing room immediately following one of her performances.

As she was removing her make-up, Miss Moran discussed the differences between acting on the stage and screen. "I guess I must be awfully fickle," she stated, "because when I was in Hollywood, I used to think that to be in the motion pictures was to be in the best business in the world, but now that I am acting on Broadway I infinitely prefer the stage and would much rather be in New York than anywhere else."

Miss Moran confessed with a touch of pride in her voice that she had attended three proms at Princeton—"the first one when I was 16 and was 'unsophisticated and unmodernized' as some over-enthusiastic newspaperman put it. I love Princeton, but don't let any Yale man get hold of that because I've been to some Yale proms, too; so, although I know a lot more Princeton men, for Yale's sake it is more tactful to be 'torn between Yale and Princeton'."

At this point Miss Moran's conversation was momentarily interrupted as she retired into an inner sanctum for a moment to change from her dressing gown into a dress. As she reappeared fastening up numerous intricate catches and buttons, she discussed the importance of publicity to an actress.

"You know, it's a nuisance, but this business of making yourself famous really counts for a lot. Personally I have never had a press agent, but have relied on being in good shows for my publicity, because then I get it anyway whether I want it or not, but, if the show I am in isn't much good, I really don't want people to hear about it and come to see it, only to be disappointed.

"As to the truth of these articles such as you see in 'movie magazines'," continued the actress, "—well, it is pretty hard to say whether they are true or not. I guess the general idea of the article is true but most publicity men are apt to elaborate just a bit too much, and sometimes I learn some pretty funny things about myself. I've often been characterized as a home loving girl, and I like houses all right—good old houses—so I guess that can pass but now in your own case, you better be sure you print nothing but the truth, or I'll be after you for libel." —Princetonian.

Information Hunters Pester McGill University Registrar

Montreal, (C.I.P.)—Running a university is like supervising the existence of a small cosmos, said T. H. Matthews, registrar of McGill University, in an address here.

"A landlady writes that two of our 'students' took rooms with her and after some days escaped via a window and sheets knotted into a rope without paying the bill. The landlady is sure they are McGill students because they wore the McGill crest on their pyjamas. As a matter of fact the two young men had never registered at the university," said Mr. Matthews who warned "landladies to ask for better credentials than crests on pyjamas."

"People expect us to solve their cross-word puzzles for them," continued Mr. Matthews. "A lady asks us to decide a fierce debate as to the number of toes an elephant has. Ambitious high school debaters wish us to write their debates for them. A fond aunt recently wrote to know whether one of our students would make a reliable husband for her neice who is an intelligent blonde, and very frequently we get enquiries about students who never were here at all."

English Club Meeting

Dissertation On Feet

Feet were made by turning up the lower end of the human frame, thus enabling man to stand without a prop after he got the knack. They consist of a heel, an instep and five toes, most of which are perpetually insurging against the administration. A foot is harder to keep happy and contented with its surroundings than a girl who has just returned from college, full of higher education.

Moreover, very few toes get along well together. They have no "esprit de corps" so to speak. There is continual friction between them and this leads to so much bad feeling and so many sore spots, that many a tortured proprietor of ten belligerent toes has looked with sad envy on a wooden-legged friend. Until some international court of arbitration is formed to settle the claim of rival toes, which insist on occupying the same place at the same time, man cannot hope for complete peace and happiness.

Feet are very retiring, seldom appearing in public. They live in shoes, boots and slippers. This is one of the great sources of indignation among feet. The man who will spend three days in having his shoulders fitted perfectly to a new coat, leaves the job of fitting his feet with shoes to a machine in Montreal, which has never seen them and has no interest in them whatever. Until the invention of the bicycle, automobile, street car and elevator, feet were used extensively for walking. Now, however, they are more or less superfluous. A great many men leave them on their desks all day, and on their mantelpiece most of the evening.

Owing to the great distance from the central heating plant, it is very difficult to keep fat properly heated in cold weather. Frigid feet are one of the curses of mankind. They are not only painful but they have a sad effect on the brain.

Feet come in sizes varying from number 1 on a double A last to number 19, standard guage. Small feet are generally preferred although they are not as useful. In China they are so greatly esteemed that Chinese women wear their corsets on their feet. There has been much unprofitable discussion as to where the largest feet can be found, but it is generally conceded that as a rule they belong to the most truthful woman.

McGill Principal Rules Publications Off Campus

Montreal — Although two new student publications, "The Black Sheep" and "The Alarm Clock" have been banned from sale on the campus of McGill University, this action by the governors must not be taken as interfering with academic freedom, according to Sir Arthur Currie, the principal.

During an address to the graduates' society, Sir Arthur said publications with extreme views must not be allowed to circulate on the campus, as they might give an erroneous impression that they expressed opinions of the university.

Outside the university, Sir Arthur said, students might express their views as they pleased. In humorous vein the principal suggested they might publish such hypothetical sheets as "Bennett's Blatherings," "King's Clarion Call," "Woodsworth's Warblings," or "Beatty's Beautitudes," but propagandist papers must be barred from the buildings.

The "Alarm Clock" was charged with having extreme political views, while "The Black Sheep" was claimed to have attacked benefactors of the university.

AT THE CAPITOL

"LAWYER MAN"
with William Powell and Joan Blondell.

A crooked politician beaten at his own game by his protegée, learning that a lawyer's duty is to act as a counsellor and defender to his clients and not as an ambitious system, is the theme of "Lawyer Man."

Anton Adam (William Powell) begins his career as a brilliant lawyer in the East Side and by defeating a big uptown lawyer establishes himself in a partnership with the well-known Robert Bentley. Adam scores many successes in his new capacity, but women have too much influence on him. A pretty chorine persuades Adam to take a breach of promise suit much against his partner's wishes and then starts his downfall.

Adam and his secretary, Olga, (Joan Blondell) lend humor to the play with their superstitions and good-luck omens taking the form of a statue of justice and the proverbial horseshoe. Olga is the ever-ready secretary who is the actual power behind the big lawyer. She warns Adam of all his impending dangers, but he doesn't always listen, thus his flop. But of course Adam gets hot under the collar after he was beaten by a woman and begins to fight back.

There is plenty of fun and a slight degree of reality in "Lawyer Man." B plus.

AT THE TIVOLI

BILLION DOLLAR SCANDAL
With Robert Armstrong, Constance Cummings, James Gleason, Olga Baclanova and others.

Billion Dollar Scandal is based vaguely on the oil racket of a notorious presidential régime. Actually, it is a composite of various hackneyed situations: prison-scenes; graft in high places; a parvenu who fights an unsuitable alliance between his daughter and a penniless young man; the usual moral touch about a young woman who flatly refuses a cocktail one morning, because she has been redeemed by her great love (to the consternation of her father, accustomed to see her move about the house with cock-eyed grace).

James Gleason affords diverting comedy. Robert Armstrong is ineffectual. Of Miss Cummings we expected better things. In one scene, she slithers into a man's room, looking very chichi, and tells him with aristocratic hauteur not to address her as if she were a street-woman. As things stood, the most ingenuous might have made that mistake.

Billion Dollar Scandal is well-served tripe. C+.

Gymnasium To Become Fantastic Eastern City

in all their musical splendour, are Billy Bisset and his boys, late of London, of Toronto, of Cleveland, and of points all over the Globe. And now from Lucerne, in Quebec have they come to this far eastern city.

This then will be the Science At-Home, and to 'Chuck' McKnight and his gang of helpers is all the credit due. He claims that it is the product of an overworked brain after writing sups last fall. But looks more like the work of a birth-gifted decorator.

The silver ball and the ring of Saturn again will revolve about the heads of the dancers, and probably will be fixtures at all Science Formals from now on.

From 'Doc' Gray, the convener, comes the news that everything is now in readiness for the biggest and best Science At-Home of all time. The number of tickets to be sold is to be limited to 300, and that that number has almost been reached, so that anyone desiring one is advised to get in touch with a committee member as soon as he drops this paper. Also he tells us that arrangements are being made to have the men's locker room left open as well as the check room, and that there will be no charge whatsoever for checking at this dance. Lastly, he informs us that it is the intention of the committee to broadcast the whole dance over our own University station if present expectations are fulfilled.

The suppers will be of the highest standard, the catering being in the hands of the Union staff, the details being cared for by Freddie Durdan, who promises only the best for the guests.

As stated previously, the favors will be something entirely new, and also of use to the 'guestesses.'

The dance will begin at nine o'clock and will continue until twenty musical scores have livened the air.

THE GLORIOUS ADVENTURE
By Richard Halliburton
(New York, Garden City Publishing Co., 1927)

Here is a book for any college student, whether he be a gold medalist in the classics, or whether he finds that declensions and conjugations are some of the greatest barriers to his true enjoyment of the storied past of Greece and of Rome. Enjoyment? I fancy I hear a laugh of derision from some students of Latin 2. Yes, I repeat, enjoyment; not only in the subject matter, but in the unique manner in which that matter is presented to the reader.

Influenced, no doubt, by the tendency of the present age, the author finds himself restless, at the outset, for new thrills and adventure, and his fancy is quickened by these lines from Tennyson's Ulysses:—

"Come, my friends,
'Tis not too late to seek a newer world.
Push off, and sitting well in order smite
The sounding furrows; for my purpose holds
To sail beyond the sunset . . . till I die . . .
To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield."

And so we find him outbound from twentieth century New York, intent only in seeking out some of the spots visited by Ulysses in his famous wanderings. But during the voyage time undergoes a remarkable change, so that while the ship arrives in a modern Greece, nearly every experience of the author is set deep in the Golden Age. This is but allegorical of the true state of Halliburton's own mind. Living as it is in the present, it is steeped in the lore of the ancient classics, as, he tells us, it has been since childhood.

"How many a night, as a very small boy," he writes, "I was rocked to sleep in my father's lap to the romantic tales of this romantic city (Troy). Hector and Paris, Ajax and Achilles and the crafty Ulysses were my intimate childhood companions. A hundred times and more . . . my eyes filled with tears when we came to the place where in the final sack of the city, Achilles' son, Pyrrhus, slew the good king Priam on his very altar, and where the little son of Hector was torn from his mother's arms to be hurled from the walls. Oh, how I loved Hector and how I hated the arrogant Achilles! . . . I never grew tired of Troy and its bloody drama. These stories had guts. Peter Rabbit! Uncle Remus! Bah! They were for idiot children."

In this fascinating manner which is interwoven with a vein of refreshing humour, the reader's mind is spirited back over the ages to be introduced to and to relive with the ancients the stirring scenes of their mythological history.

There is, however, one bold departure from the general theme. In a chapter, significantly entitled "To Hell With Ulysses," the author meets an attractive maiden, and thereafter, for a time, the classic theme of the book becomes very secondary to romance. This seems out of place, and my mind constitutes the one serious weakness to an otherwise delightful book. —W.S.L.

In One Ear

By Outis

"Outis" takes pleasure in passing it on to the scores who have been bombarding the Journal with inquiries as to the identity of the blonde sitting in the press-box besides "Choppie" Milne at the B.W.F. Assault, that she was not Alexandrine Gibb of "No Man's Land" fame, but an added attraction imported by T.A. in cahoots with Charlie.

* * * *

Why else would the A.B. of C. have one spotlight for the boxers and another for her? The auxiliary spot certainly wasn't for Choppie.

* * * *

No we haven't her phone number, but she does look kind. In fact, she was overheard by persons near the press-box to voice solicitude lest Abe Zvonkin get hurt.

* * * *

Well, my dear, now that you have all the other girls in a rage over the way you monopolize "Choppie", what are you going to do about it?

* * * *

Hum . . Hum . . Wonder if she can proof read?

* * * *

All I can say after seeing Abe Zvonkin wrestle is that we have another George Ketiladze.

* * * *

Will Bill J., Science '33, return the white flannels he borrowed last Fall for his appearance with the Brass Band.

* * * *

A dry cleaning would certainly be in order, also.

* * * *

Talking about Extension lectures, yesterday's proved to be an extended lecture.

* * * *

Mere males will not be admitted at the Levana swimming meet to be held this week. Has the depression hit the bathing industry also?

* * * *

The Science Formal should bring forth another exhibition of the "Kingston Crouch."

* * * *

You know that peculiar style of dancing characteristic of the local products, and which the co-eds invariably adopt after a few weeks in Kingston.

* * * *

The "Kingston Crouch" results when the lady partner rests her head on her partner's shoulder or on his cheek, meanwhile keeping her body away from him.

* * * *

The resulting semi-circle (or curves in the wrong place) looks terrible, and ungraceful to say the least. It looks much like a pair of parenthesis—()—stuck together.

* * * *

Otherwise "Outis asks—"Why dance?"

Pictures of the University of Illinois have been published in 150 German newspapers recently.

McGILL BASKETBALLERS STILL UNDEFEATED

McGill Cagers Won Basketball Encounter

Basketball moved back into the category of hockey from a scoring stand point when the Queen's Senior basketball squad hit a slump in the second half of their tussle with McGill on Saturday night and allowed the Red team to pile up a 13 point margin after having led them at half time by the score of 15-13. The game ended with a score of 36-23.

The Tricolor started out like champions, and had the much touted McGill squad on the run during the first half. Their passing and combination play had the Red men baffled, and were it not for Young, the McGill pivot man, Queen's would have run up a much higher score. Captain Donny Bews incurred 3 fouls during the early part of the game which seemed to put him off his mettle for a time, but the stalwart guard settled down and played heads-up basketball during the rest of the game.

The second half was a tough one for Queen's. McGill began by running in 5 baskets in a row and obtained a lead which was too formidable for Queen's to overcome. Although the team fought back hard, continually carrying the play into their opponent's territory they lacked the necessary scoring punch.

Wilf Newman was the best man on the floor for Queen's. He gave a fine display of clever ball-handling and dribbling and proved a constant worry to the McGill team.

Doug Rooke, one of the newcomers on the team, played a whale of a game offensively, and incidently he was Queen's high srorer.

Bews was in there fighting all the time, while McLaughlin played his usual heady game, scoring 5 points and holding Faulkner, his check, to one basket.

Carter also played a good game. There were several times when he saved scores by checking up Young closely.

For McGill, Lewin and Young were the stars. The former sniped four baskets in the second half. Rice and Smaills were also good for the visitors.

The game—1st half:

Don Young started the game off by sniping a basket about 1 minutes after the toss-up but Queen's retaliated when Bews tried a long shot and Newman coming in fast under the basket banged in the rebound. Rice was fouled by Bews and scored one of his two free throws. On the next tip off Young received a pass under the basket and sunk one. Queen's settled down and there were some nice passing plays, McFadden just missing a beauty on a pass from Newman. Carter relieved Hallett. Donny Bews then pulled one of his sensational long shots which went clean through the basket for a score. Unfortunately Donny had two more fouls called on him and he was relieved by Rooke, Newman going to guard and Carter to centre. On the next play a long pass by Newman to McMahon under the basket resulted in a score for Queen's. Rooke sunk a free shot when he was fouled by Smaill, and on the next play scored another basket on a pass from Newman. Rooke was turning in a very good game. The play was becoming faster and McGill were tightening up when McLaughlin sunk a long shot. On the next play he was coming in under the basket when he was fouled by Smaill, and netted another point for Queen's making the score 12-10 for Queen's. Newman scored a basket on a long shot and Rooke sunk a foul just before the half time whistle blew.

Second half:

Queen's looked like the winners when McMahon potted one from the side, but Lewin for McGill came in strong to run in two baskets to tie up the score, followed by a foul shot by Rice and two more baskets by Young and Smaill to put McGill 5 points up. From this time McGill were never headed. Queen's rushed time after time but were unable to penetrate McGill's defence while the Red team led by Young and Lewin piled up a thirteen point lead. Donny Bews was hurt when on nabbing the ball from the tip off he dribbled down the floor fast and on shooting was fouled by Young. McLaughlin replaced him and scored both foul shots. The game ended with Queen's fighting hard under the McGill basket. Final score: 36-23.

SPORTS SLANTS

Did you take in all the attractions over the week-end. If you parked in the Gym on Friday you saw boxing and rasslin'. If you squeezed your way into the arena the same evening, you saw hockey and boxing. The referees rassled with the problems of a general war.

* * * * * * *

Give the Senior Basketeers a hand. They fought manfully against a strong tricky squad that has played together for four years. It was only in the final few minutes that McGill forged into a decided lead.

* * * * * * *

'Twas an unlucky evening for Don Bews. Everything seemed to happen to him. No wonder he didn't get on the score sheet oftener.

* * * * * * *

For that matter it's a good team that keeps a man like Hallett scoreless. He had some dirty luck on shots but then McGill doesn't give many seconds to get set.

* * * * * * *

The scoreboard proved to be much better in its new position. In McGill or Toronto no such service is provided, but Queen's have to be one up.

* * * * * * *

Levana are resting after their strenuous week-end. The girls might easily have been winners of the hockey game. They looked just as good as Varsity.

* * * * * * *

The B. W. & F. team should be in fine fettle for the Intercollegiate assault later in the month.

Sports Views

The hockey situation cleared up with the playing of Friday's game. The Tricolor had a slim chance before that but that flew away in a cloud of punches. Kingston have shown that they are the best team in the loop and they get the championship deservedly. Theoretically they are not yet ready for laurels but for once figures don't get a chance.

A few yards from the Arena in Queen's Gym, the boys were swattin' one another with all their tissues and getting cheered for it. In the Arena a couple of friendly smacks exchanged was rewarded by eternal disgrace in the penalty box.

With the Seniors out of it our hopes now rest with the Tricolor Juniors. The date of their next battle is as yet uncertain but Wally Ebner is keeping them in shape by constant practise. We may see some good games yet.

The weekend wasn't so fortunate for Queen's teams. The girls lost a close hockey game to Varsity and then Levana took another on the chin when Belleville gals walked away with the basketball games. But in both games the co-eds gave all they had and that is all any team can do.

The senior basketball game proved to be even more exciting than the Varsity tilt the week before. Queen's were every bit as good as McGill for the greater part of the game but the Red huskies set a bewildering pace all through and the Tricolor could not seem to maintain it.

Donny Bews doesn't want many more basketball evenings like that one. He doesn't get many penalties any time but the banishment for three of them in the first half certainly affected his playing. And in the last half he sustained a bump that would slow anyone up.

Queen's Intermediates continued their winning ways with a pretty win over the local Y.M.C.A. Pete Lewis is bringing his team along at a fast clip and they may go a long way.

Both the Intermediates and Juniors are idle now until the 17, when Napanee teams visit here. In the first meeting between these teams, the honors were shared, the Juniors losing and the Intermediates winning. This time both Queen's teams are due to take the invaders.

B. W. & F. is popular in this town and the present Tricolor band are worthy of the finest support. Once again they proved their value against strong opposition, and once again, Messrs. Bews, Jarvis, Allan and McGowan can take the bows for staging a well planned and interesting show.

Junior Basketballers Vanquish "Y" Squad

Joe Josephson's Tricolor Juniors are finally going places, scoring their second win on Friday evening by downing the local "Y" 25 to 12 on the latter's court.

Showing much better shooting ability and passing the juniors speedily jumped into a slight lead, being in front at half time 10 points to 1.

Play was closer in the second half, but Queen's outscored the "Y" again to finish strongly.

Queen's: — Forwards, Simmons 9, Cohen; centre, Mateer 6; guards, Henley 9, McDiarmid; subs., Ward, Hunter and Rodger 2.

Rugby Rules Altered By Rules Commission

Toronto—At the meeting of the Rules Commission of the Intercollegiate Rugby Union there were a number of changes made in the rules, some of minor importance and several of far-reaching effect. These changes, when drafted and revised, will be adopted by the College Union and will also be sent on to the Canadian Rugby Union as recommendations by that body.

The most important change was in regard to interference by linesmen of the team in possession of the ball. Last Fall men on the line of scrimmage could make interference, after the ball was snapped, for three yards towards their opponents' goal, but now, through the change made on Saturday, men on the line of scrimmage when the ball is snapped, can interfere anywhere behind the line of scrimmage. There was considerable discussion over this change, which was really a carry-over from last year's meeting and was brought to a head mainly by the success of the charging ends as played by most teams.

One of the main objectives of coaches in the Canadian game is to be successful in getting end runs under way, and last Fall end runs were conspicuous by their lack of success. The members of the commission considered the question from all angles and it finally developed into a question whether to permit blocking backs or to allow linesmen to drop back and make interference. It was felt that the blocking back system was a feature that should be kept out of the Canadian game and the linesmen will be permitted to drop back and interfere, presumably with the charging ends who were mainly responsible for the lack of success of end runs.

However, before a linesman can drop back to interfere there must be at least seven and not more than eight men on the line of scrimmage when the ball is snapped. In case of a team which is playing a man short through penalty the minimum number on the line will be six and the maximum seven.

The other most important changes dealt with blocked or partially blocked kicks and are three in number as follows:—

(1) A partially blocked kick, crossing the line of scrimmage in flight, will be regarded as an ordinary kick and of the kicking side only the kicker and those he has put on side may recover the ball without giving yards.

(2) If the kicking side has a kick blocked on the last down and recovers possession without the ball being in possession of the other team (when a ball has been dribbled it shall be deemed as to have been in possession) the kicking team must make yards or lose possession where the last scrimmage was held.

To help freshmen women glide along more easily at tea, etiquette rules were given out at the University of Southern California. According to these rules, such remarks as "I am afraid I have stayed too long," or "hope I haven't bored you talking so much" are very bad taste.

Kingston Eliminates Tricolor Senior "B's"

By losing to Frontenacs on Friday evening by a 4 to 1 score, the Tricolor Senior "B" team, as well as other teams in the group, virtually gave up hope of tying Kingston for the leadership. The Senior Limestone squad have a double-nelson on first place and only a miracle can prevent them winning. And those who have seen a few of the games in this group say such a miracle cannot happen.

It was a weird game with good, bad and very indifferent hockey thrown in by both teams. Just to convince the fans that all the punches were not being heaved in the gym. that evening, the players staged a general melee in the final period that livened the game considerably. This lasted for a minute or so, and then the referees got in the last punch by chasing a few of the participants.

While stories differ, they all agree that Storms, and Bentley started the war, and in a few seconds both teams moved up to the fighting zone and engaged the enemy. Previously Arthurs and Bellringer had decided that it would be a good idea to knock each other's block off, and both got the gate for five minutes. This may have started the ill feeling.

To get back to the hockey game itself, there wasn't much ambition displayed to get the handful of fans hot. Kingston got the only goal of the first period, when Batty took a pass from Bentley smack in front of Daniels and gave him no chance to block it. The Tricolor had every bit as much of the play though and should have had a goal or two. An accident to Muchmore, the Kingston wing, held up the proceedings, but he came back for more in the final period and scored a goal.

Paddy Patterson got the lone Queen's counter a few seconds after the second period commenced. It was a freak shot that struck the netting behind Gowsell, bounded back and trickled down the goalie's back into the net. That tied it up.

Queen's tried hard and had many likely drives on the Frontenac net, but they missed quite a few chances also from close in efforts. As it happened Kingston got a couple more goals by shots from Thurlby and Muchmore, and that looked to be plenty the way the game was going. Murphy for Queen's got a nick in the scalp, but he got back later just to show that nicks are not everything. The period ended Kingston 3 and Queen's 1.

While only one goal was scored by Thurlby in the last period, there was plenty of work done, much of it illegal and the referees prepared for a stormy session and got it.

As related the rough work led up to the Arthurs-Bellringer feud and from there it was only a couple of punches and cross checks to the Storms-Bentley bust. The climax rapidly developed into a donnybrook and the game was over. Patterson, Teague, Murphy and Storms were best for Queen's, with the others turning in good efforts. For Kingston, Thurlby and Bellringer starred.

The teams:

Queen's—Goal, Daniels; centre, Arthurs; wings, Murphy and Patterson; defence, Kostuik and Storms; Subs., Smith, Elliott; Teague and Gibson.

Kingston—Goal, Gowsell; centre, Bellringer; wings, Muchmore and Nicholson; defence, Roberts and Bentley; subs., Wilson, Thurlby and Batty.

Referees: Watts and Smith.

Tricolor Battlers Took Six Bouts From Toronto

The first named showed a lot of class and looks to be a real prospect for the featherweight class.

Thomas and Thovien, put on another interesting bout, the latter made an excellent showing, gaining two falls in the second round.

Yule, of Toronto and Johnstone of Queen's supplied the next grappling set-to, and the Tricolor representative emerged victorious. Johnstone showed exceptional strength and class for a welterweight, to win from the talented Yule, who is well thought of in wrestling circles in Toronto.

The boxing bouts were all of high calibre. The feature brought together Ridgeway and Merve Peever, probably the greatest boxer ever reveloped at Queen's. Peever administered terrific punishment to Ridgeway, his West End opponent, and won by a technical K.O. in the third round. Peever is again boxing in great style, and should annex another intercollegiate title without much trouble this season.

Jack Ewen, secured a narrow victory over the Ontario lightweight champion, Art Wood. Jack boxed on even terms with Wood for two rounds, and secured the verdict with a rousing rally in the final round. He carried the battle to his man with a two fisted attack. Ewen won, judging on points scored, cinching victory with a last round blaze, but Coach Jarvis intimated a draw would have been satisfactory.

Jim McGill, showed great improvement over his first bout, and won the first two rounds against P. Corns of Toronto. He tired badly in the final and lost a very close decision. McGill will be a hard man to beat when he gets into condition.

Ran MacDonald lost a three round decision to A. Braybook of Toronto, after a spirited three rounder. McDonald made an excellent showing against a man who has been boxing with the best of the simon pures in the 135 lb. class for the past four years. Experience was the only thing which beat him.

Jimmy Peters scored his first win, and a most convincing one over Hall of the West End Club. Peters continues to show real improvement, and he peppered his Toronto competitor with a two-handed and relentless attack to win over his man in the third round via a technical knockout. Jimmy has a real chance to win the coveted inter-collegiate class weight.

Ray Binch showed the fans some real class and surprised the followers by scoring a two-round knockout over Fred. Quinton of Toronto, a sturdy well set young fellow. Binch is looked upon as another real find for the boxing club, and will make his presence felt before he finishes his term at Queen's.

R. W. Code spotted Samwell twelve or fifteen lbs. and gave a good account of himself in a three-round bout. These two mixed it freely, and kept the crowd in a frenzy of excitement all the way through. There was no decision in this joust.

Mitchell and Johnstone, both of Queen's, boxed another exhibition bout. Mitchell had a little too much experience for his game little opponent, and secured a technical knockout in the second round. Both of these boys will come on with a little more experience.

Belleville Girls Best Co-Ed Basketballers

Queen's Basketball team lost to Belleville Collegiate Quintet by a score of 31-27, on Saturday evening.

Slow passing and occasional fumbles on the part of Queen's made the score 21-9 in favor of Belleville at half time.

During the second period Queen's playing, particularly their passing, was much better. Although they made many baskets they could not overcome the lead gained by Belleville in the first half, and the game ended with a score of 32-27. Doreen Kenny was the high scorer for Queen's and Anna Gartley for the Belleville team.

Science '36 Dance Drew Large Crowd

The members of Science '36 held a highly successful year dance last Friday evening, although it was necessary to repel a raid made by some student insurgents who sought to "crash" the dance. But they were promptly ejected, forcibly and otherwise, by dancers who had no intention of being victimized by a group of common, ordinary, every day "chisellers." "Bob" Warmington's orchestra supplied some first class music which was composed of all of the most popular tunes of the day. The new birthday dance, ever increasing in popularity, was extremely interesting and highly applauded. Phyllis Ruby was the winner of the lucky number draw, and received a beautiful prize.

Rupert Dumbrille sang several snappy numbers which were well received, the two most popular being "Somebody Stole My Gal," and "Please."

Even the "terrifying" Grant Hall floor was put in great shape by the Science boys, and "all went merry as the marriage bell" until someone turned out a few of the multitude of lights. But alas, even with this now romantic atmosphere, it was too near the end of the dance for the gay caballeros to begin feeling sentimental, and start sitting out, but hear in mind you two other Freshman years, who are yet to hold a dance, that the lights of Grant Hall can be dimmed to a most pleasing advantage.

Professor and Mrs. W. C. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. A. G. Farquharson, and Mrs. and Mrs. R. W. Stevens were the patrons.

Medical Library Hours

The Medical Library is open each week day from 9 a.m. to 10 p.m., except for one hour each evening from 6-7 a.m.; on Saturdays the Library closes at 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

MIAMI UNIVERSITY — The assistant professor of speech refused Gary Cooper a membership in the university dramatic club when he was a student several years ago because he appeared a "gangling youth with little composure." Since that time Cooper has been made an honorary member.

Campus and Gym

The Levana Hockey team is playing a team from Meds '35 on Thursday at one o'clock in Harty Arena. The subs will be trying hard to fill the place left vacant by Dot Clemens, in preparation for a game on Saturday night with a girl's team from Keene.

The Levana Swimming Meet is being held to-night and the girls are very enthusiastic about it. Only Levana will be admitted to the pool, and the girls are asked to support their year entrants.

MUSICAL PROGRAM

The program for the Ban Righ Hall Musical to be held on Sunday, February 12th, will include two groups of piano solos by Miss Phyllis Knight and two groups of songs by Mrs. Wyatt. Mr. Wenger who is playing several violin numbers will be accompanied by Dr. Gibson, and Mr. John Percival will sing a group of songs which are sure to please the audience.

Freshmen Lose Hats When Vigilance Committee Acts

The axe has fallen. Monday morning twenty-five or thirty frosh felt the grasp of the long arm of the Vigilance Committee as it snatched illicit hats from their disobedient heads. Long lines of stern sophomores assembled at ten to eight at the doors of the Arts Building, and demanded of all Freshmen to surrender their head covering if it was not a tam.

The exact means of disposing of this confiscated illicit property is not known. It is rumored that they will be distributed among those unfortunate students who never seem to be able to procure hats of their own and consequently go without. It is more probable, however, that the offending head-gear will be redeemable at the end of the week on payment of a small fine and perhaps Arts Court proceedings.

STOP PRESS. It was officially stated late last night that these hats will be redeemable from the Sheriff of the Arts Concursus on Saturday, Feb. 11th.

E. J. Carlyle To Speak In Nichol Hall To-day

The "Economic Side of Mining" will be the subject of the lecture to be given before the Queen's branch of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy by E. J. Carlyle this afternoon at 4.15 in Nichol Hall.

Mr. Carlyle will attend the dinner to be given by the final year students in Mining and Metallurgy, and at 8 p.m. he will give an informal talk at the annual smoker.

The visitor, who is Secretary-Treasury of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, has had a varied and exciting career.

Perhaps the highlight of his career was his stay in Russia during the feverish days of 1914. At that time Mr. Carlyle was metallurgical engineer for Sissert Corporation. The confiscation of the property by the Soviets terminated the activities of the Sissert Corporation, and his own also.

Through his connection with the Shorey plant of the American Smelting and Refining Company in Peru, Mr. Carlyle has acquired an extensive knowledge of conditions in South America.

From Tuscaloosa, Ala., comes the report that a student flunked a course entitled "How to Study," and passed all his other subjects with an average of "B".

Glee Club Preparing To Present Cantata

The Queen's Glee Club under the direction of Mrs. H. L. Tracy has been working for some time on the Peasant Cantata by Bach which will be presented on March 7th in Grant Hall.

About forty-five voices will take part in this production. With the added attractions of ballet dancers and orchestra accompaniment it promises to be a rare musical treat. Such outstanding soloists as Mrs. Tracy, soprano; Mr. Percival, baritone; Mr. Sparks, tenor, will take leading parts in the cantata.

This composition is comic in nature. It represents a village fete given to his tenants by the Count or Lord of the Manor, in the course of which his guests vie with each other in singing his praises, and those of the lady and the young heir, interspersed with some hard hits at the Bailiff's tyrannical disposition. The Peasant Cantata was written and performed in 1742 as an act of homage to Carl Heinrich von Dieuskau.

A rehearsal of all parts will be held in Ban Righ Thursday at 5 p.m.

Toronto Beat Local Co-Ed Hockey Team

Outplayed and outskated, the Queen's Women's Intercollegiate Hockey team was defeated by the speedier Varsity sextette by the score of 1-0. The single tally was made by Jean Atkinson early in the second period. Varsity's combination play outwitted the Queen's team and only the ineffectual shots of the Varsity wings prevented a bigger score.

The first period was very slow with both teams on the defensive. Individual rushes down the ice were not supported by either team. The second period showed faster play and after Varsity's goal was scored the Queen's girls showed more fight, but their shots were inaccurate. In the third period they tried hard to even the score, but the Varsity defence proved too strong. The Varsity wings were unable to increase the one-point lead because of the effective work of Margaret McGregor in goal.

The second period showed the best play of the evening when the Varsity team proved their superiority. For Queen's, Margaret McGregor, Jean Stewart and Jean Nelson turned in the best game. Jean Nelson was handicapped by the absence of her defence partner, Dot Clemens, whose unfortunate accident prevented her from playing.

Line-up:

Varsity—Goal, D. Lumley; defence, M. Rous, J. Gow; wings, B. Fowler, D. Starr; centre, M. Thompson; subs., Jan. Atkinson, E. Sansan.

Queen's—Goal, M. McGregor; defence, J. Nelson, L. Ward; wings, I. Stewart, J. Cameron; centre, M. Chambers; subs., R. Cordy, A. Mason, C. Milne.

Referee—Jimmy McArthur.

GLEE CLUB NOTICE

The two practices of the Levana Glee Club which have been called for Thursday will not conflict. The first practice is scheduled for four o'clock in the Red Room for the Glee Club itself, and second at five o'clock in Ban Righ Hall Common Room for the Glee Club, assisted by the tenors and basses who are in the Bach Cantata production.

John Masefield's Work Recalled By Impending Visit Of Poet Laureate

First Work Aroused Diversity Of Opinion On Realism Question

JOHN MASEFIELD

John Masefield, the British Poet Laureate, will speak in the K.C.V.I. Auditorium on Wednesday, February 15th at eight o'clock. The lecture will consist chiefly of a reading of his own poetry.

Masefield is best known by his long dramatic narrative poems. When his first work, "The Everlasting Mercy," was published in 1912, it was greeted hy a diversity of opinion as to whether it was too rough and uncouth, or whether its realism was justified by its artistic intention. It was, nevertheless, widely read.

"Dauber" is a very interesting account of a boy who signed on a sailing ship, that he might paint pictures of the sea. Masefield's descriptions of the storm at Cape Horn, of Dauber's hardships before the mast, and of his tragic death, are written with a vividness and with a beauty of language unsurpassed in contemporary poets.

"Reynard the Fox" is a thrilling story of the hunt told chiefly from the point of view of the animal, whose fineness is contrasted with the coarseness of the human beings.

Masefield has also published a large amount of lyric and reflective verse. His work is most artistic in the sonnet sequence "In Praise of Beauty."

Of a different nature are such poems as "Sea-Fever" and "A Wanderer's Song." The call of the sea and the haunting melody appeal strongly to the imagination. One of the best known is "Cargoes," beginning:

"Quinquireme of Nineveh from distant Ophir, Rowing home to haven in sunny Palestine,"

Masefield is the author of a number of plays in verse, notably "Pompey the Great," "The Tragedy of Nan" and "Good Friday." He has also written several prose works, prominent among which are the two novels "Odtaa" and "Sard Harker."

Miss Gordon Speaks At Levana Meeting

Miss Wilhelmina Gordon was the guest speaker at the February meeting of the Levana Society, and gave a very interesting talk on the educational work which the I.O.D.E. undertakes. This society has as one of its many interests, the instruction of the children of immigrants in the ideals and principles of British citizenship. The I. O. D. E., Miss Gordon said, was also interested in the maintenance of War Memorial Scholarships, which are open to University undergraduates.

Miss Nina Railton also contributed to the program with a delightful vocal solo and Miss Julie Garland gave an amusing recitation.

Mining Is Extracting Profits From Rocks

E. Carlyle Explained Problems Of Mining

"Mining can be defined as the art of extracting profits from ore and rocks. We must make profits for shareholders", stated E. J. Carlyle, Secretary-Treasurer of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy in a fascinating lecture delivered before the Queen's branch of the Institute, in Nichol Hall. Mr. Carlyle went on to tell of his exciting experiences abroad.

He was sent as a "pyritic smelter" (a man who knows about smelting sulphur rich ores) to the Sissert Corporation in Russia. While there, he worked out a way to reduce the consumption of coke in smelting copper ores from 6% to 3%—but in doing it he had many setbacks. One time he was told that although it was true he was saving coke, yet there was a much greater loss of copper in the "slag" and as coke was cheap then and copper dear—it would be better to use more coke and save the copper loss. However he finally got the process worked out to his satisfaction and it became known as the "American charge."

Mr. Carlyle then told of an engineer in Mexico who had greatly increased the tonnage of a certain mine thus reducing the "costs" and greatly prolonging its life by being able to treat a much lower grade of ore—the engineer having to issue "currency of his own" during one of the Mexican Revolutions.

Mr. Carlyle's opinion is that the markets of the world are not yet saturated. He proved his point by stating that one-fifth of the families in the United States lack kitchen sinks; one-third lack bath-tubs; 30% have no electric lights; 60% have no telephones, and that one-third of them have no automobile. "Only if civilization stands still and

French Songs To Feature Concert

Music loving students will have a real treat on Wednesday, February 15th, when a concert of French and French-Canadian songs will be given in Convocation Hall, commencing at 4 P.M.

The songs are being presented under the auspices of the French Club. Besides unison songs there will also be several solos. The songs which are simple in melody and composition, have been carefully chosen and the program should have wide appeal. Some of them are quite well known such as "Au Clair de la Lune," "Dans les Chantiers" and "Vive la Canadienne". Then there will be choice Chorals and piano solos composed by such men as Cesar Franck, Benjamin Godard and Claude Debussy.

Solos will be sung by Mesdames Frances Robertson, Lottie Wyatt, Denise Chabot, and Agnes Brehner and Messieurs T. F. Gelley, A. Davies, A. Tremblay and J. Fortin, the piano music being by the Misses Lois Baker and Blossom Agnes. Do not fail to attend for it will be an afternoon of well spent enjoyment. A program of the songs written in full will be distributed at the door. There is no admission charge and everyone is welcome.

Corona Of No Value As Omen Of Storm

Many students and citizens who happened to be out between the hours of ten and midnight last Wednesday were surprised by the sight of a well-defined corona around the moon. Knowing that many people hold special beliefs regarding such phenomena of Nature, an inquiring reporter set out to find out whether any particular significance could be attached to this spectacular display. According to the Meteorological Bureau of Queen's, the corona has no value as a storm omen. When reached the R. M. C. post had nothing to report, as the event had not been witnessed.

At Home Committee Reports No Deficit

The report of the At Home Committee was presented for adoption at the last meeting of the Arts Society. According to the financial statement the Formal this year was a greater success than last, the dance paying for itself.

The report of the Finance Committee was adopted and the Convener then presented the general report with his recommendations for the guidance and assistance of future Committees. Among these latter were the suggestions that in future the Arts Society as individuals should cooperate with the Formal Committee to a greater extent and that a subscription list should be taken of the final year to decide the advisability of having a Formal.

The Convener and his Committee were granted tickets to the Science Formal in view of the fact that they had neglected to make use of the customary practice of allowing the Committee expenses to the At Home.

Mr. Stu. Warrington intimated that there would be an Arts Dinner this year if a suitable speaker could be obtained and a sufficient number of guests. The cost would be around a dollar and a half.

Hon. Martin Burrell To Lecture Monday

"The Use and Abuse of Books" will be the topic of the Extension lecture to be given by Hon. Martin Burrell in Convocation Hall next Monday afternoon at 5 P.M.

Mr. Burrell, who was given an honorary degree by Queen's in 1928, has had an extremely varied and active career. Successively Minister of Agriculture, Minister of Mines, and Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue, he resigned from the government in 1920 to assume the responsibilities of Parliamentary Librarian at Ottawa, which office he still occupies.

"We Have No Fish To Peddle," States Jag Editor Explaining Policy Of New Magazine

Wearing a pink polka dot suit, brown shoes and a yellow tie, the Editor of the Monthly Jag this morning faced a battery of eager reporters, and in terse terms described the aims and intentions of the periodical.

"We have no axe to grind," said he, in reply to a question as to what would be the policy of the Jag, the new humorous magazine. "We have no fish to peddle. We do not advocate socialism, bilingualism, absenteeism, communism, capitalism, or any of the multitudinous isms which perplex a depression weary world. We realize that we cannot cure the ills of the world but we do believe that it can be temporarily cheered up by a good Jag."

"Is it true that the Jag has been banned from many university campuses and that similar action may be taken at Queen's?" he was asked.

"The Jag has never been banned," he answered, "but of course I can't say how it will be received at Queen's.

At this moment a seedy looking grain dealer walked into the office and with a parting injunction to the newspaper sleuths that the Jag wants humorous stories, poems and articles, the Editor dismissed them. As they filed out, he said, "Tell your readers to mail their contributions to the Editor of the Jag at the University Post Office."

Science Formal Ends To Strains Of Waltz "I Love You Truly"

Perfect Arrangements Feature Of Annual Science Formal — Interior Of Gym Changed Into Glamorous City Of The Gorgeous East

"DOC" GRAY

Who carried to success the onerous tasks of Convener for the Science At-Home.

By J. N. Milne

With the strains of "I Love You Truly" still ringing in our ears another Science Formal is at an end. Hereafter follow the impressions of your observer as he danced in the middle of the floor towards the end of this great party.

Another great dance is nearly over, only a few more numbers are left now, and then the Science '33 At Home will be merely a memory. But what a memory, perfect music, perfect crowd, beautiful girls on all sides, paying tribute to the Halls of Science.

Congratulations 'Doc' Gray, and likewise to all the other members of your committeee, who have excelled themselves in making this dance of all dances the high spot of the college year.

A sell out from the start, dozens have been turned away in the last three days, but all to a good cause. A good dance can be spoilt by too large a crowd. And this gang is neither too large nor too small.

As is everything else, so are the decorations — perfect. And once again must we pay homage to 'Chuck' McKnight, the ace of decorators, and to all his assistants, who have successfully turned a drab and dreary gym into a charming city of the east.

We dance in the middle of this city. All around are minarets, towering o'er us, shafts of light of ever changing color stream up their silvery sides, back of them is the impenetrable blackness of a desert at night.

From the inside of a minaret in front of us, Billy Bisset and his unbeatable orchestra send out faultless rhythm, fox trots, waltz, medleys, fast or slow, or what have you, each piece better

Statistics Invaluable In Modern Business

W. Park Spoke at Last Commerce Luncheon

William Park of the T. Eaton Co.'s Statistical Department was the guest speaker at Tuesday's Commerce Club Luncheon. "The Statistical department of any large department store plays a large part in the control of the merchandising departments, for it is only through these records that a comparison can be made between past and present performances," said Mr. Park in opening his lecture. "Department managers are left pretty much on their own with regard to their merchandising policies, but are supplied with details of the expenses they may be expected to bear, and are able to adjust their mark up accordingly. These expenses fall into three general classifications—general expense over which a department has no control, such as a proportion of the salaries of chief executives, a second class which varies in amount dependent upon the extent to which the department makes use of such expense as delivery service, rent of floor space, etc., and third class, over which the departments have full control. With these figures to work with the department manager forecasts the business which he expects to turn over during the next month or two and makes his purchases accordingly. He marks up the goods enough to take care of necessary price reductions, waste allowance, and expenses, and leave a profit at the end of the period. The Statistical Department keeps close record of the purchases and sales and conducts a dual stock-taking twice a year.

Unlike most department stores which use net sales as a base, the T. Eaton Company calculate their percentages of expenses and reductions on the cost of goods sold, the advantage being that profit percent-

Seven Sailors Get Marine Certificates

In the recent examinations held by the Department of Marine, seven men attending the School of Navigation at Queen's were successful in securing their certificates. The examinations, which are held every month, must be passed one hundred per cent correct for the applicant to get his "ticket." Lately the standard has been considerably raised and consequently the percentage of successful candidates is not as great.

The School of Navigation, which occupies the north-east corner of the basement in Ontario Hall was started more than twenty years ago by Dr. A. L. Clarke, present Dean of Applied Science. Dean Clarke is the principal of the School and takes a great interest in it. A great deal of the practical

The Faculty Of Arts And Business Training

In common with many others, Commerce students are wondering whether the University is a proper place for a business training. Some time ago, J. M. Macdonnel made the statement that "Arts students in our Universities are in danger of dissipating their energy on many studies, some of questionable value, and of failing utterly to acquire what it is the real business of the University to impart". How does our Commerce department meet this criticism?

To begin with, all Commerce students must spend at least two years in Arts. During that time they have considerable latitude in their choice of study and have every opportunity to become interested in things intellectual. Even in their final two years, Commerce students are not as completely segregated from Arts as are the other faculties on the campus. They use the same buildings, belong to the same societies, and frequently attend the lectures in one or two Arts subjects alongside their own specialized economics.

What, after all, are the claims to distinction of the average Commerce graduate. First of all, he has learned how to apply himself to his work. With a rightly enforced honour standard and highly specialized courses to contend with, he is forced to concentrate on his studies. The long lists of assignments and references which must be looked after are adequate proof of this contention. Secondly, he normally acquires an enquiring attitude towards life as he finds it. Economics is not a fixed science such as chemistry or physics. The way in which man earns his daily bread is constantly changing, sometimes with very little apparent reason. In a study of economics, therefore, there is room for several points of view, all of which may be correct. The student is, in this way, encouraged to become original, for he is just as likely to be right in his conclusions as someone who thinks strictly according to rule of thumb. In the third place, it is expected that the Commerce graduate adopt a professional attitude towards business. To what extent this is possible need not be discussed here but the fact does remain that, as a university man, he should be above the faults which are so glaringly prevalent in our business world as it is to-day. Greed, theft, and corruption should be far from his thoughts. True, a formal professional code of ethics may be lacking, but there is an unwritten code which the Queen's Commerce faculty are continually assuming. The former head of the Department of Commerce and Administration, W. C. Clark, was a great exponent of this new attitude towards everyday life. In discussing the difficulty of the business man in building for himself a general philosophy of living he claimed: "The new and better path lies in the application of the professional spirit and of professional methods to business. If we are to be saved from the dangers of a crudely acquisitive society, this professional point of view must be spread among business men as widely and as rapidly as possible. The task in so far as it can be performed by education is one which only the University can perform, and it is one which will call for the best which the University can give."

On the other hand, there is the danger that the Commerce student may become too much Commerce and not enough student. Eventually he gets his degree, but what use is it to him? Perhaps he has a smattering of economic theory, investing and thesis-writing but the question of application of his knowledge must be considered. If, as is generally conceded, he must start at the bottom and work his way up, why is not an Arts degree of equal value? If he must learn the particular features of the business he is in, why not superimpose this new knowledge on a broader base than such specialized technique that the Commerce man professes? These points are worthy of consideration.

The whole theory of business training in the Arts faculty is open to question. Each view has several worthy supporters and probably many discussions in the past have centered around this topic. That they will continue to do so may be taken for granted.

Routine

If we were able to view the affairs of the earth objectively, what would we make of the curious hodge-podge into which the day, once an interval of light followed by darkness, has been distorted?

With the rigid precision as characteristic of some of his interferences, so lacking in others, man has divided the day into hours of unalterable length and no variation. He has specified through custom and convention how groups of them shall be spent; midnight to dawn in sleeping; early morning, noon, and early evening in eating. Early in life each individual determines a routine for himself and society expects that he follow it, else he is wasting his time, accomplishing nothing, getting nowhere.

For man must get somewhere; he must accomplish something during his brief stay on earth. He must fill the empty hours of a day with some sort of achievement. What he does is not important, so long as he does something, so long as he is busy, so long as he refrains from irritating others about him with a semblance of idleness.

The most useful word coined by man in promoting this state of affairs is the word "hurry". The very sound of it suggests a mad dash from one place to another, from the present task to a new one. Uttered in the proper tones of voice it is supposed to have starting power to move mountains. In accepting hurry as the vehicle to carry him through time, man boards a fast moving train and travels down a single track so intent on the goal of getting somewhere in the shortest possible time that he does not think to look out of the window. No matter—if he did, the landscape would be blurred.

In order that he may not weaken and abandon his self appointed task, civilization has introduced a framework of calendars, whistles, bells, newspapers, organizations, meetings, and meeting-places to keep him constantly on the move. One or two failures to respond to the bell, to comply with the indication of the calendar may cause him to lose out in the opportunity to bustle about with the others who are truly living.

The activities of the whole days are determined by the name of the day, arbitrarily assigned. The failure to do the accustomed thing at the accustomed time is regarded as a complete loss of that time, as though it never existed. When Joe Brown cannot see a show as he is prone to do on Saturday night, it ceases to be Saturday night, and no longer assigned to a definite place on the calendar, is nothing, a lapse to be endured until Sunday comes with its definite spacings.

Rarely, an individual has declared himself free of calendar, routine, and job. Having proceeded to fill his mornings and evenings with whatever he choses, he is pointed out by his contemporaries as the "queer old duck." By what means can we justify ourselves, what can we say we are doing when we spend whole days at the commonplace of sweeping houses, screwing bolts on distorted pieces of metal, of sitting hour by hour in orderly rows listening to the sound of the voice of another? When we sit before a table intent on successively hitting with the fingers movable parts of a metal object ingeniously pieced together, do we understand that we are merely making use of a device long ago invented, called language, in which we record combinations of symbols born in our minds for others to perceive and interpret?

—Purdue Exponent.

Open-Mindedness

Like the poor, there are present in every social group a certain number of narrow-minded and prejudiced individuals who pounce with a certain degree of malicious joy upon every new idea suggested. Often in government and social organizations they are the cause of the failure of some needed reform of progressive thought.

Steadfast adherence to one's principles and convictions is unquestionably one of the finest traits of character to be found. On the other hand, open-mindedness tempered with toleration of other peoples' thoughts will go a long way towards aiding the progress and betterment of society.

On this campus we meet daily this ever present type of individual who scoffs at and condemns practically every new idea that comes to light. Have you ever noticed his credentials?

If he is considering some new and progressive movement, he usually admits before long that his knowledge is limited because he didn't have time to read the announcement carefully. If he is criticizing some debate or discussion which has taken place, he invariably reveals his absence at the time of the argument and his ignorance of what actually happened.

Assuredly there is nothing more desirable than a controversy over and discussion of all progressive measures. We need individuals who firmly adhere to their convictions. However, criticisms based upon hearsay and sketchy accounts of what is supposed to have happened are not only dangerous, but also detrimental to the progress of society.

Gananoque Defeats Tricolor Hockeyists

With their backs to the wall and defeat promising elimination from the group race, the Tricolors dropped their final home game to Gananoque the final score being 4 to 2.

Only a small crowd turned out to witness the contest and they saw little to get hot about during the first two periods. Queen's missed many chances to score but lacked the persistence or something and the third period was well on the way before the Tricolor got busy and packed in a couple of goals. But by that time the eastern seaport natives had garnered four and there was nothing to worry abont.

As a result of the fracas, Queen's chances, if they were any good at all, went glimmering and Gan alone remains in the scramble with only a slim chance of overtaking Kingston Frontenacs.

The first period went scoreless, but that did not mean that the players were not near the net. Arthurs who played a good game had Sequin, the Gan. goalie out of his citadel on one occasion and then barged the puck wide to keep off the score sheet. Scott of Gan. duplicated this performance later on and the puck did not want to go in the net.

The second period produced a couple of goals, Gan getting them both. The first was a tough one for Daniels to have counted against him, for Dixon slapped a pass out from a corner and it deflected off Danny's skates to start the scoring. Wallace of Queen's, a newcomer who showed promise, had a glorious chance to tie it up a short time later, but he too missed an open net. The second Gan goal also was rather a gift for Danny was beaten by a lift from the blue line, to put Gan two up.

Both teams began to warm up in the last period and as a result the faithful fans saw some decent hockey. Both teams helped themselves to a couple. Queen's had a seeming advantage when both Scott and Dixon were sent off for tripping but with two men to the good, they could not get into the Gan net. Brennan got Gan's third one, and Beresford got their fourth and last before Queen's came to life. Then with Kostnik who played well all evening, leading the parade, Queen's got busy and Carr got the first goal on a pass from Arthurs, while Paddy Patterson got the second one unassisted.

Scott, Sequin, Moore and Dixon were best for Gan, while Kostuik, Arthurs, Smith and Patterson looked good for Queen's.

"Are You Telling Us?"

Describing examinations at Oxford, a member of that university's debating team said, "First, we all light our pipes and sit around discussing the subject for a while. Then we start to write and if we get stuck we can always ask our neighbor. That is all expected. You can't write a paper unless you know the subject."

Arts Sophs To Hold Year Dance St. Valentine's Day

The St. Valentine's Dance planned by Arts '35 for next Tuesday evening is creating a great deal of interest around the campus. A Journal reporter yesterday learned from Ted. Hughes, convener, that the sale of tickets is proceeding briskly, but that there still remains ample opportunity for those who desire to enjoy themselves at the La Salle Hotel on the night of Feb. 14th to purchase tickets.

"Table reservations may be made at the Hotel," Mr. Hughes stated, "and tickets may be purchased from any member of the Dance Committee, or at the Arts Club Room, from 10-12, on Saturday. All arrangements are being made to ensure that this St. Valentine's party will be a notable success."

Musical Program

The program for the Ban Righ Hall Musical to be held on Sunday, February 12th, will include two groups of piano solos by Miss Phyllis Knight and two groups of songs by Mrs. Wiatt. Mr. Wenger who is playing several violin numbers will be accompanied by Dr. Gibson, and Mr. John Percival will sing a group of songs which are sure to please the audience.

The Inescapable Diseases

Human beings, even in a celibate condition, live in a state of constant warfare against antagonistic organisms. That man has survived, and has even improved his conditions shows that he has remained in the ascendancy, but he has never been able to annihilate his opponents completely, and probably never will, although the progress of medical science uncovers new weapons every year. The mortality rates of most diseases have been reduced, as have the numbers of cases, but even those against which science has been most successful still exist, ready to strike at a weak spot in class or individual defences. It is possible, just possible, for a person or group of persons to entrench themselves behind a barrier of aseptic appliances so as to be safe from attack. The modern operating room may be regarded as a small fortress, practically impregnable to infection, and hospital rooms are comparatively safe, but few people could enjoy living constantly in such surroundings, and sedulously to avoid contact with disease is not to overcome disease.

The elimination of pathogenic bacteria from the earth and its atmosphere is a task beyond man's power. Such advances as are made towards a disease free race must be made through an armouring of the individual against infection. It is an unfortunate fact that active resistance to disease, like education, is seldom transmitted by heredity. The child is born with a measure of immunity derived from the maternal blood, but this passes off, and the infant faces a host of invisible enemies, from which he is defended only by the natural protective reactions of his tissues, and the assistance afforded these reactions by medicine. There are many diseases, croup, measles, whooping cough, scarlatina, etc., which are seldom contracted by adults, because a great majority of people are brought into contact with these ailments early in life. The individual may go through a fairly severe attack, or may be so little affected that the infection is not regarded as a real illness, but even the mildest cases of these diseases so stimulate the body to reaction against the causative agents that any later attack is summarily dealt with, and so the adult is reasonably assured of freedom from recurrences. The body of the growing youngster reacts swiftly to such infections and survives them in most cases, but the more quiescent tissues of the adult may not deal with them so adequately. An attack of measles or scarlatina in later life is frequently a very serious business.

Methods of artificial immunization against many diseases have been developed and their use has reduced the number and severity of cases. In Ontario, innoculation service is efficient and non-costly and when the public take full advantage of such service, cases of diptheria, scarlatina and other diseases, already reduced in frequency, will become even less common.

But the number of diseases which science can at present prevent is limited. The public health expert, dispensing preventative treatment, will not supplant the physician for many years, if he ever does. Disease is as old as man. Evidences of tubercular and other infections have been found in the skeletons of men and beasts whose time was before history, and while man is continually learning more and better ways of warding off the attacks of disease, there is little hope that the time will come when man may rest from the battle.

A hospital management, wielding a power that is almost tyrannical, is able to maintain a little republic in which disease may not be transmitted, but must run its course and subside for one reason or another. Hospitalisation of the world as a whole can hardly be imagined. Measures approaching such a course might be instituted by a governing body invested with such powers over a world population as the hospital staff holds over its inmates, but a radical change in human nature would be necessary for the creation of such a body, and human nature has remained obstinately changeless for ages. Man is, as he has always been, politically incapable of eliminating the infectious diseases.

Investigation Reveals Most Detested Foods

"Eat it because it's good for you."

That's what mamma said to unruly Mary and Johnny.

Now Mary and Johnny go to Washington—and they still refuse to eat vegetables.

Good old standbys of the garden — parsnips, rutabagas, and onions—are listed by college students as the foods they detest most and always refuse to eat. Stewed tomatoes, cabbage, eggplant, asparagus, and turnips come in for their share of disdain. Strangely, only three students placed the time-honored spinach at the bottom of the preference list.

Hominy Disliked

Even more universally avoided than garden vegetables is hominy. Fish, sauerkraut, and mush, also are looked on askance.

But on the pleasant side of the ledger—what do college students prefer in their cuisine? Meats, especially steaks, are the first choice of the big men of bone and muscle. Ice cream and pastries run a close second, and chili lags in third place. Two students even confessed that they liked bananas most of all.

Foreign Foods Favored

Dishes with foreign names have a peculiar attraction for some students. Caviar de russe, kidney saute, wiener schnitzel, sauerkraut, and curried rice were among those mentioned.

Garlic, artichokes, bread, and frosted coffee are some of the unusual choices for first place. One man admitted that milk was his favorite. He drinks three quarts a day.

Miss Gordon Addresses Levana Society Meeting

The business part of the meeting included a number of important motions. Florence Batley was appointed to represent the Levana Society on the Local Council of Women. The dates for the Levana Spring Tea Dance and the Levana Society Elections were selected as March 25 and March 8 respectively. The election committee was appointed as follows: Doris Houston, convener, Helen Matheson, Margaret Frafarodager and Barbara Tait. A sum of $120 was voted to the L. A. B. of C. for payment of Levana's share in the expenses of the kitchenette in the gymnasium. It was also decided that the Levana Society would pay $1.25 for each graduating member, as the Levana grant to the Tricolor.

UNIVERSITY OF WASHINGTON—Professor M. E. Benson, of the English department told a member of his freshman class to clean his typewriter with gasoline and a tooth brush before handing in any more themes. The student took the prof's advice, then wrote to the professor that he could no longer brush his teeth. In the letter the student threatened to take the matter up with the board of regents. Purdue Exponent.

Condon Eats All

Faculty members do not seem to lose the prejudices of school days. With the exception, they hate the same vegetables as the students, and prefer meats.

The exception is Herbert T. Condon, student counselor. He likes everything, absolutely everything, he says—even parsnips and hominy.

The Spell Of Twilight

I love to stand in yonder glade
As twilight's spell is cast.
I love to watch the sunset fade
Until the day is past.

The shadows steal from tree to tree
Like silent stealthy foes.
The warblers cease their songs of glee
The wood-man homeward goes.

No golden sprite, no woodland elf
Disturbs this peaceful bower.
No living thing except myself
Enjoys sweet twilight's hour.

The darkness spreads: quick comes the night
The view is fading fast.
Oh! how my mind fills with delight
As twilight's spell is cast.

OHIO STATE UNIVERSITY—Mutilated and stolen books cost the university library $1,000 yearly.

OKLAHOMA CITY COLLEGE—Football men work their way through college by being on the city fire department.

S. C. M. Shrapnel

Students on this continent are often criticized for taking too little interest in world affairs. Why need this be true?

The world today is in the turmoil and confusion of an economic crisis, which, while it has spelled disaster and ruin for countless thousands, cannot but finally result in a new economic order—one that must be for the better, since it can hardly be worse. One might even venture to prophesy that in the future, religion will play an important part in the life of the people. But it will be the spirit of vital Christianity as enshrined in a social conception, the concept of the family,—God the universal Father, all men His children, and hence all men brothers.

The world today is making history (and tremendously interesting history at that). Cannot we as students prepare ourselves to play an important part. Not only in world affairs of the future, but in those of the present day? Here is a quotation from an article in the "Canadian Student" that tells us how students "count" in Europe and Asia:

"Look at pre-war Russia—where the one cry that could drive the Black Hundreds to their dens was "The students are coming!" And there is no need to cite the place of the student in present-day Russian plans—he is and is to be the leader of the next generation. Look at the part played by Spanish students in the recent revolution. Look at the immense influence of the Chinese Universities in the transformation of China, and the grave seriousness of the Chinese or Indian students studying abroad, who looks upon himself as one charged, on his return to his own country, with high civic obligations which he must seek at all costs to fulfil. Look, too, at the vivid life of the political clubs in English Universities, their meetings, their discussion groups, their "real" debates, their vivid pamphlets, their eager concern about the next step in political action. In an English University students discuss what should be done as though they themselves were the actors on the stage; here you discuss vital issues (if at all) as if you were the audience at a play."

UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN—A professor of English has the interesting hobby of collecting letters from famous Englishmen and Americans. In his possession are about 200 letters among which are epistles from Booth Tarkington, Vachel Lindsay, John Galsworthy, H. G Wells, and many other noted authors.

"MAID OF THE MOUNTAINS"
with
Harry Welchman, Betty Stockfield, Nancy Brown, Gus McNaughton and others

Those who cherish memories of Frederick Lonsdale's famous musical comedy, "The Maid of the Mountains" can be treated to an equally swift-moving, happily humorous and essentially tuneful talkie version. British International Pictures have made a very good screen production of the musical comedy, which many a British soldier saw while on leave in London during the war.

In "Maid of the Mountains," there is a notable absence of the American technique in dealing with musical comedies on the screen, the light touch having been preserved, and the scenery and accoutrements being modest, but perfectly adequate to the needs of the piece.

The direction, under Lupino Lane, will charm many. The technique leans toward the stylistic method made popular by the German producers. The management of the soldiers in the chase after Baldasarre is an example of this. The film, moreover, contains all the humour of the original without any exaggeration and manages as well to infuse a maximum amount of romance into the action.

The music has been confined to the popular numbers like "At Seventeen", "Paradise for two" and "Love will find a way", whilst Lonsdale's story has been preserved in its entirety.

Of the principal roles, Harry Welchman is seen as Baldasarre, romantic brigand, who impersonates the governor to save his captured sweetheart. Welchman is a gallant bandit, and has a pleasant voice. Betty Stockfield is Teresa and looks and acts as if it is not long before she will be on this side of the Atlantic. Nancy Brown, in the title role, is supposed to do some singing, but censors probably realizing that she does not seem to be much at home, cut the only thing she might have been able to do. The comedians, Gus MacNaughton, cast as the retiring governor, and Wallace Lupino do some very neat comedy work.

You'll enjoy "Maid of the Mountains." A—.

AT THE TIVOLI

THE PHANTOM OF CRESTWOOD
With Ricards Cortes, Karen Morley, Skeets Gallaher, Pauline Frederick.

There is a new use for games which have been discarded out of boredom and sent upstairs to add to the confusion of the garrett. Give a houseparty, and instead of throwing feathered darts at a bull's eye, use the precision you have acquired from hours of practice in despatching your undesirable playmates.

"The Phantom of Crestwood" has not nearly so simple a situation as would be entailed in the above modest proposal. It is after big, dramatic stuff, like motives of dark and ancient pride, femmes fatales who hold on to letters, secret passageways, leering death masks, and young love. C+.

"BYRON: THE LAST JOURNEY"
By Harold Nicholson

There is a tendency among a certain type of modern biographer to select one of the haloed heroes of history, and to prove with merciless conclusiveness that he was not a remarkable person after all, but an insignificant character with a diseased mentality. Doubtless the effects of disabilities, and complexes upon history have recently usurped a place of exaggerated importance, but there is a certain salutary flavour about this disparaging type of biography. One of the most sane examples of it can be found in Harold Nicholson's story of Byron's last tragic years, in a book known as "Byron; The Last Journey."

Byron's contemporaries, whether they knew him as a "Glorious Apollo" or as an incarnation of vice, were hysterical in the interest they displayed in him. In fact, they went off the deep end about him as a poet, an adventurer, a social idol, or a social outcast. His genius and his gregariousness became a legend. Since his character has been successively gilded and blackened by biographers, it is refreshing to find a portrait-sketch of such eminent sanity as that of Nicolson. Of course, he is doing it consciously: he is deliberately confuting the legend, and incidentally introducing the maximum of humour into what he knows is a story of tragic pathos. The ludicrous description of Byron's relations with Leigh Hunt's family, of his dramatic self pity, and the sketch of la Guiccioli as a stupid and not too attractive blonde, are all designed to fit into the background of the irritable, odd little man with the tartan jacket and greying hair, who was all that was left of Lord Byron by the year 1820. The hero of Greek liberty becomes an ineffectual figure, morbidly self-depreciatory and in no sense a man of action. Nicolson maintains that Byron himself was only too well aware of his ineffectiveness, and here a note of the heroic creeps into the otherwise unheroic story. Byron sacrificed himself deliberately as the victim of his incapacity for action. He knew that he could never really be the saviour of Greece and having realized that the illusion could not be indefinitely maintained, he decided that death alone could save his character from irretrievable disfame. So he went, with what Nicholson emphasises as "gay courage," to the fever-ridden swamps of Missolonghi, and there spent his last months, plagued almost beyond endurance by the factiousness and quarrels of the people he had come to save. He had pulled the hornets nest about his ears, and he took the consequences as a kind of pathetic penance, even to an inglorious death.

The interest of "The Last Journey" lies not only in the sympathetic portrait of the man who was not a hero until he had given up hope of achieving heroism. Nicholson's knowledge of Greece and the Greek mentality has enabled him to produce a brilliant sketch of the muddles, the absurdities and the bathos of what ought to have been a noble struggle. It was just as well that pro-Hellenic feeling in England did not have to stand the shock of knowing how incredibly ignoble the heroes of modern Greece could be. Public opinion still battened on the Iliad and the Parthenon, and was unaware that Prince Alexander Mavrocordatos was a stout, pink little man with gold-rimmed spectacles. From the Hellenic legend also Nicolson dispels the golden aura, and displays the struggle in all its incongruity. Yet he manages to disentagle it into some semblance of continuity, and presents the whole story with some lucidity and a great deal of sympathetic humour.

ARTS WINS INTERFACULTY B.W.F.

Engineers Unable To Retain Their Title

By Scotty McGowan

A few of the faithful braved the zero weather on Wednesday night to cheer their gladiators to victory. For the first time in many a moon the Arts men overcome the hardy Engineers to take the championship. Medicine ranked a poor third with only one point won by Forsberg of swimming fame.

The outstanding wrestling bout was that between Bews of Arts and Jolliffe of Medicine. These boys put up a brand of wrestling unsurpassed in any assault this year.

Theology sent forth their lone entry in Delve who wrestled in the heavy weight class.

The boxers also put on a good show with the Woolgar-Carr argument taking the "honours". It was a real battle from start to finish, Carr getting the Judges' decision on a strong finish. There will be a return engagement between these two men on Saturday afternoon at the gym. for a place on the intercollegiate team. Williams, a beginner, made a creditable showing against the classy "Ran" MacDonald. Binch, Peters and Mitchell, all looked good in the winning role.

Boxing referee, J. Jarvis.

Judges, Prof. M. Baker, Sgt. Maj. Boss, J. Ewen.

Wrestling referee, J. Bews.

Judges, Dr. D. I. Matheson, A. Hutchison.

Announcer—M. Swartz.

Time-keeper—Prof. Jemmet.

BOXING

125 lbs. — Mitchell, S., vs. Moodie,, A.—Mitchell was a big surprise in this fight. He carried a real two-fisted attack to Moodie to easily take the three rounds and the decision.

135 lbs.—MacDonald vs. Williams —This was a good bout. Williams made an exceptionally fine showing against a more experienced opponent. MacDonald won the decision.

150 lbs..—Hoch vs. McIntosh—Exhibition—McIntosh was the aggressor all the way and carried the fight to Hoch. "Mac" packed a wicked right, but Hoch was clever defensively and rolled most of the punches. It was a nice exhibition of the manly art.

155 lbs.—Carr, A., vs. Woolgar, S.—This was a real battle from start to finish. Woolgar gave all he had in the first and second rounds and tired badly in the third. Carr hit a hard right hand which showed "Chuck" up. Carr won a close decision.

165 lbs.—Binch, S., vs. Park, A. —Binch was too strong for his less experienced opponent. Park, however showed a barrel of courage to stay in there and is no mean prospect. Binch packed a hard right to win the fight by technical K.O. in the second round.

175 lbs.—Peters, A., vs. Dalton, M. Walton put up a surprisingly strong stand against Jimmy Peters. Dalton gave almost as good as he got, but was groggy at the end of the second round. A hard volley of rights stopped Dalton in the 3rd, and Jimmy got credit for a technical K.O.

WRESTLING

118 lbs.—May, A., vs. O'Connor, M.—May displayed more condition and greater experience to win by two falls in first round.

125 lbs.—Forsberg, M., vs. Greenacre, S.—Forsberg, aggressor from first bell, and easily secured two falls in first round. Forsberg will be a hard man to keep off intercollegiate team.

145 lbs.—Conklin-Brace — Exhibition. This bout was jammed full of action. Conklin was continually after Brace who fought his way out of several close falls in the 1st round. In the 2nd round Brace reversed tactics, walked right in and secured two falls in quick succession over Conklin.

135 lbs.—Campbell vs. Tuovinen —Challenge bout for intercollegiate team. Jimmy Campbell's greater experience won him 2 falls in quick succession. Tuovinen however looked very good and next year should make the intercollegiate squad.

145 lbs.—Johnson, S., vs. Beach, A.—This was an exceptionally fine bout, plenty of action and good wrestling. At the end of the first round Johnson came close to securing a fall, but the bell saved his opponent. The 2nd round was very even, but his margin in the 1st won him the decision.

155 lbs.—Bews, A., vs. Jolliffe, M.—There was no doubt in anyone's mind that this was easily the best wrestling match of the evening. Both boys were clever, fast, and knew their wrestling. It was nip and tuck all the way, but Bews displayed nice form to obtain one fall which gave him a well-earned decision. Both these boys are future intercollegiate calibre.

Heavy-weight—Roberts, A. vs. Delve T.—Plenty of action for heavies, at first it looked more like a boxing bout—rights and straight lefts. After four minutes of wrestling Roberts secured a fall. The fighting Theolog, went to work and only the time robbed him of a fall on his opponent. In the 2nd round Roberts displayed much better wrestling to take the 2nd fall in about one minute.

Diving Exhibition To Feature Aquatic Meet

With the success of the last two swimming meets still ringing in their ears, the A.B. of C. announces the presentation of still another such meet at 8.30 this evening, Saturday 11th.

Chief of all attractions will be the exhibition diving of Alfie Phillips, British Empire champion, who placed fourth in the Olympics at Los Angeles last summer. To those who enjoy diving, this will be an exhibition really worth seeing, by one who knows the game from the bottom up.

Along with this there will be a water-polo game between Toronto Varsity and the Queen's seniors. This will be the first game against strong opposition that the Queen's boys will have played, but all the team are showing up in fine shape and intend to send the visitors back defeated.

The full programme is as follows:

1. Water polo game—Kingston All-Stars vs. Queen's 2nds.

2. Exhibition of combination diving by the Queen's divers, Miss Nelson, Miss Cameron, Ross, Forsberg, McKerracher, and Howard.

3. 200 yds. Breast Stroke—open to R.M.C., K.S.C., Y.M.C.A., and Queen's.

4. 100 yds. free style-open to the same.

5. 50 yds. free style—open to the same.

6. Water polo — Varsity vs. Queen's.

7. Exhibition of diving by Alfie Phillips, British Empire champion.

Basketballers Invade Toronto And London

Elsewhere will be found stories from Toronto and London on the coming Intercollegiate basketball games to be played with the Tricolor over the week-end.

With Manager Jack Finley in charge, the Seniors have left for Toronto, with two hard games to look forward to, one in Toronto tonight, and one in London on Saturday evening.

The team has been pronounced ready and should just about take the two games for they demonstrated that they are every bit as good as the famed Blue team, and the latter downed Western last Saturday.

With one win and a loss in the two games already played, Queen's need to keep winning to stay in the fight for championship honours. They turned in a peach of a game against Varsity and richly deserved their win, despite protests from the latter town that the Toronto school was away off color in both Montreal and Kingston. And, by the way, Varsity will be seeking the old revenge and will put up a battle that should tax the Tricolor to the limit.

Against McGill Queen's showed a wonderful stand in spite of a rough evening that took away Donny Bews' services for the better part of the game. It is doubtful if Bews will ever have such a disastrous evening in basketball again, and he should be right on edge for the battle with the Blues. The close refereeing of Bannon was apparently the cause of some timidness about checking in the latter part of the game and this aided in the loss. With all their hard luck Queen's were right on the Red team's heels and they can make a much better showing.

Western must have a fairly strong squad, or did the Varsity Blues have a third off night? At any rate the Mustangs who never give a hoot for anybody's advance ballyhoo or reputation stepped into the Queen city and proceeded to scare the entire Ward by putting up a sensational fight to finish only a few points down. Back in their London home the purple clad gladiators will be awaiting Queen's with all kinds of confidence and the game should be a peach to watch.

Varsity Confident Of Taking Return Game

Toronto, Ont., Feb. 10, (C.I.P.) —In the second game of a featured double-headed bill to be run at the Mutual Street Arena, Friday night, St. Michael's College will play Hobberlin's Lizzies in a Big Five game at eight o'clock, and Varsity will play the return intercollegiate Senior game with Queen's University, at nine o'clock. Although Varsity lost to the Tricolor in Kingston two weeks ago by a close score in a listless game, with the big Blue team away off colour. Varsity will likely take their opponents in the return fixture here. The Blues are getting back into form rapidly and have improved tremendously since their two losses in the first two intercollegiate games when they were playing a brand of ball away short of their capabilities.

Harold Sniderman, who is playing his fourth season with the senior squad, has been elected captain and has another year before him before he graduates in medicine. He has been one of the most effective guards Varsity has had throughout his four years on the team. In Gold and Wood the Blues have two more high ranking guards and with two centres of smart calibre in Ford and Caplan, the pivot position is well taken care of for the front line. In Ian Allison, Varsity has the smartest forward artist in the intercollegiate series, Hal Collins, who has been out-lucked in the scoring columns for two weeks now, has at last broken the jinx and is setting up long shots with regularity

SPORTS SLANTS

The Senior Basketball team can use all the luck obtainable for their week-end games. Manager Finley would like one potent rabbit's foot.

* * * * * *

Saturday evening in town won't be sportless. For details of the big aquatic meet see the sport page.

* * * * * *

The Junior hockeyists are still pawing the dirt and awaiting word as to their next victims. They go to Brockville to-night for an exhibition tilt.

* * * * * *

Interfaculty B. W. & F. always goes over big, and with interest high locally in Assaults generally, the gym was deservedly jammed on Wednesday.

* * * * * *

If the Varsity basketballers have had three off nights in their three games played (as Varsity sport writers have hinted) another to-night won't hurt them. Any team with three off evenings shouldn't go far anyway.

* * * * * *

The Gan hockey team are fighters. They have had little or no ice to practice on lately but showed speed and stamina in downing Queen's.

* * * * * *

Intermediate and Junior basketball squads have a week's rest—No games being carded until the 17th. During this period Joe Josephson, the Junior mentor, will likely dope out a third play.

* * * * * *

No use talking the Senior "B's" are in the "in and outers" class. After absorbing a 4 to 2 licking at the hands of Gan on Monday, they stepped into that ambitious burg and settled with the town team by kalsomining them 1 to 0. However, as Kingston again defeated the Cadets 3 to 2, the race is over and Kingston are champs.

* * * * * *

Queen's, Ottawa University and R.M.C. will likely form an Intermediate Intercollegiate group. Details are not settled as yet but the group is assured more later.

Advice And Counsel For Prim Co-Eds Featured In Journal Columns In 1901-2

By Mary Fraser

Well folks, we're about to dedicade this epistle to the ladies! Not that the men won't get a laugh too. (At least we hope someone gets a laugh, even if it is on us).

To resume our perusal of the Journal in 1901-02, we find a great many columns headed by distinctly arresting captions such as "LADIES". Nice for the gals to get some recognition in a college where co-education was still a novelty!

Here's one that should inspire someone to something or other:

"The melancholy days have come, bringing with them the students "brown and sere". The student who has idled all summer comes back reluctantly with many a "long and lingering look behind"; but the one who has managed to read a tittle (?) between the calls of home duties comes in glad of heart, for this scholastic precinct, where she can give her undivided attention to her studies, is her happy hunting-ground. To one and all comes the clarion call, "TO THE WORK". (Egad, fight the good fight!) Forget that you ever swung in a hammock, forget that you ever fished a fish, think no more of the hay-cart drives, the corn-roasts, the sunny days on the beach, the bonnet-hops (whateffer) and the allurements of the Midway." (In fact, let all minds be blank. And now—get a good grip on yourself, this is a shock.) "That was good while it lasted, but it wasn't—life". (All too, too devastating.) To continue, "The Senior comes back with a whirlwind sigh," (Yeah, they must've found it easy to sigh like a whirlwind.) "She is supposed to be having her "day". (etc. etc.) The Junior has lost a little of her pristine recklessness." (How too utterly primitive!) The Sophs get honorable mention — but Freshettes are passed over with an appropriate pause.

Levana meetings are referred to by the female who composed another article as being "but a small part of our time after all, but still we find it helps. It is an influence which tends to soften the roughness of College life, and so is prized by us."

Women of the old days were expected to be prepared on entering university life to "rough it as men did, and to be sometimes considered less than lady-like because this life was their choice." And GIRLS! Their hope chests were being neglected, their samplers accumulated dust and moths in the attic while the hussies gallivanted, tom-boy fashion to COLLEGE, of all places!

In referring to the "unquestionably rude manner in which some of the more ignorant students" had insisted on continuing a Levana tea-dance long after time-to-go-home had arrived, an editorial remarks: "The inordinate eagerness which is shown by some young people to dance. Dance, DANCE on every possible occasion, and the evident inability to find satisfaction in any quieter intercourse are very much to be deplored." It continues to the effect that the feelings of the hostess should be considered and that "any other basis for social functions would destroy the hospitality altogether and make modesty and chivalry a by-word." (Say, they aren't even by-words now. Chicalry is dead, and as for modesty—) (Betcha we know someone around here who would agree with that part about the curse of dancing anyway).

And here's another touching bit:

"Queen's girls are now looking forward to the near future of domestic activity, which for some will not last any longer than five months, for others will stretch out indefinitely. In a very little time we shall pack away our books and look for our darning needles and aprons. We cannot be sorrier for girls who have not had the experience of a college education than for those who do not know the quieter pleasures of dusting the hall-stairs." (Aw now!) "Clever the college girl may be, and in her element when surrounded by piles of books and pads and pens, but there is something radically wrong if she does not experience a distinct feeling of satisfaction deep-dwelling, inherent, when she finds herself on the sunniest of mornings clad in a big check apron polishing the breakfast cups." (GOOD OLD DAYS).

After reading countless ditties about the merits of ye old Alma Mater we got rather a shock when we found this in another editorial: "His Lordship, the Bishop of Ontario might have spared or at least softened the warning given in an address at Trinity to the effect that it was unwise for parents to send their sons to McGill or Queen's rather than to Trinity, for that in these colleges "there was not that development, that stamping of gentlemanly characteristics which was to be found in every graduate of Trinity"! When clergymen accept honorary degrees from a university it would at least be good taste to omit that university from the list of institutions against people in the east or west have to be warned."

Apparently however, the newspaper report of the speech was all wrong, because the Bishop wrote a hot and heavy letter to the Journal saying that his remarks had been "absurdly perverted". The old college couldn't have been quite AS BAD AS ALL THAT!

It's All in the Game

William "Jumbo" Morano, star guard on the Sing Sing football team was recently released on parole, to the despair of his coach and teammates. He was immediately signed up by a well-known eastern professional eleven.

Sing Sing's coach for the past season, by the way, was none other than John Law, of Notre Dame.

WELLESLEY COLLEGE — A professor at the college believes that modern women are more serious-minded than their sisters of former generations.

Science Formal Ends To Strains Of Dreamy Waltz

than the one before. How long can he keep this up?—for ever as far as we're concerned!

Behind us, beneath the balcony, the letters SC. '33 shine down on us, keeping guard on their last formal at Queen's.

Overhead, old Saturn slowly revolves, searchlights playing on him, as he sends one little square of light scurrying after another over floor, up wall, and away across the ceiling, in never ending succession.

The lights around us change all the time, now one color, now another, never seemingly the same twice, now bright blue, now a fantastic mixture, now a blood red, and we never know what to expect next.

On either side of Billy Bisset, who stands there with a full-faced grin, are two minarets with revolving sections which show kalerdoscopic rays as from a spectrum. They seem to be the centre of interest, for many times this evening have couples stood around and peered in.

For this congenial gathering, three suppers were necessary, and Freddie Durdan lived up to all his promises in presenting the best that could be had. As a remembrance of a highly pleasing dance, 'her ladyship' was given a useful souvenir in the form of a metal paper-knife, on which is embossed the Science crest and appropriate words.

From eleven until twelve, that's yesterday now, the good old Queen's station put Billy Bisset on the air. Not the first time for Billy by any means. But if he sounds as good over the air as he does from the centre of this floor, we'll wager that a good many Kingston homes spent an enjoyable hour hearkening unto the sweet strains of a 'swell' orchestra.

We were highly honored to welcome Mesdames W. H. Fyfe, A. L. Clark, S. N. Graham, D. S. Ellis, W. P. Wilgar and S. C. Morgan as Patronesses, and only hope that future dances may be graced by their presence.

And so on with the dance Billy, old boy, the end draws near, so let's make the best of the last few dances. And may your head be light and your throat be wet by this afternoon.

Varsity Team Confident Of Winning Return Game

whenever he is left uncovered by his check. Young Joe Wagman has been improving in every game and is now playing a brand of ball equal to that of the first line forwards. Whenever Wagman enters the game the whole team's play speeds up from the effect of the fighting efforts of the diminutive youngster who stepped right up from the city junior Y.M.C.A. team of last year.

With these eight players on the line-up Varsity is fighting hard for the rest of their intercollegiate schedule to win back the respect and prestige they so unfortunately lost in their first two games in Montreal and Kingston. With the defeat of the Mustangs from Western under their belts, they are well on their way.

IOWA STATE UNIVERSITY—A reading survey, compiled by the English department, revealed that women on the campus favored books while men preferred magazines.

E. J. Carlyle Explained Problems Of Mining

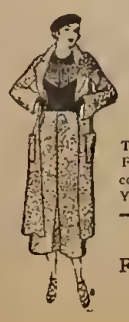
the peoples of backward nations have no hope of improvement in their condition will the markets be saturated." Imagine if the hordes of India and China were able to buy such a simple thing as a nickel-plated kettle, what is would mean to mining. Mr. Carlyle believes that the "Moving picture" which educates nations on the living conditions of other nations, will play a large part in helping future demand.



Mr. Carlyle then touched on a different phase of the industry when he said, "The biggest asset of the Institute of Mining and Metallurgy is the personnel. The mining engineer is one of the best Canadian citizens, he's cosmopolitan, he knows everyone connected with the mine from the "bohunk" to the millionaire. The men of the mining fraternity from coast to coast are proud of one another's achievements and they are always generous to each other with their "new" ideas which they give out at the Transactions of the Institute, the day of secret processes being past." Mr. Carlyle went on to tell of the new process and mill of the McIntyre gold mine which came into being through the researches of Jim Denny, and of the new alloy recently put on the market by the Anaconda Copper Co. which is made of beryllium and copper, resembles gold and has a 50% greater tensile strength than copper. Mr. Carlyle likened the Institute to one of the old trade "guilds" of three hundred years ago. It is honourable in its altruism and in its record of conquering the wilderness and causing such towns as Noranda, Timmins and Trail to come into being.

Mr. Carlyle then told an amusing story of a young Englishman who came into his office in Montreal and said a group of his countrymen would like to send out an exploratory party if there was any land left in Canada that hadn't been explored. Mr. Carlyle took a map and showed him thousands and thousands of square miles where it is likely that no white man has ever been. The future of the Canadian Mining Industry is indeed great.

Pictures Illustrated Glacier Formation

Two reels of moving pictures, one of glaciers and underground rivers, the other illustrating the work of the normal cycle of erosion were shown in Ontario Hall last Wednesday afternoon at 4 p.m. The pictures were loaned to the Miller Club by the Dominion Government and proved of great educational interest.

Snow accumulates high up in the mountains, gradually through the pressure of overlying snow it turns first to nevé then to ice and once it begins moving due to the normal forces of gravity, it is known as a "glacier." Measurements have been made by placing stakes at various points on certain glaciers and it has been found that year by year the glaciers advance grinding their way down the mountain sides until finally they reach an altitude where they melt, forming a glacial stream. During the advance, huge rocks are carved out of the mountain and fall on to the surface of the glacier forming what is known as a "moraine," which is a long line of rocks and debris stretching down the glacier. The surface of the glacier is full of great "crevasses" or cracks and sometimes pinnacles of ice are left standing which are called "seracs."

Rain sinks into soil and soft types of rocks such as limestones gradually dissolving them. In time "caves" or holes are formed underground some of which are very large such as the Monteagle Cave of Tennessee, into which men can ride on horseback. Over long periods of time, the continual dripping of water from the roof of caverns forms "stalactites" or long pieces of rock hanging from the roof. Where the drops of water fall to the floor "stalagmites" are built up. Sometimes the roof of a cave collapses except in one place and then a "natural bridge" is left, that formed at Lexington Virginia being especially high and beautiful.

A cycle of erosion occurs when streams and rivers work over a country gradually flattening it towards sea level. In youth a stream spends most of its energy on down-cutting forming chasms and along its course are found many waterfalls where there have been layers of hard rock. Gradually its valleys broaden and there is less down cutting until finally the whole region is a mass of slopes. The stream is then said to be at maturity. In old age, the hill tops are all worn down to a plain which has a very gentle slope towards the sea and over which the stream meanders on flood plains. The moving pictures were well illustrated by diagrams which helped a great deal in understanding the processes at work.

Campus and Gym

The Levana Hockey team has arranged a game with a girl's team from Keene, Ont, for to-morrow night, at 7.15 p.m. in Harty Arena. The line-up of the visiting team is as follows: Goal, L. McCarthy; defence, K. McCarthy, K. Nelson; centre, M. Brown; wings, D. Gainor, H. Nelson; subs., E. Nelson, M. McCarthy and R. Gainor.

The Queen's line-up will be:

Goal, M. McGregor; defence, Jean Nelson, Dot. Clemens; centre, M. Chambers; wings, Jean Cameron, Jean Stewart; subs., Lillian Ward, Carmel Milne, Ruby Cordy.

In a game with Meds. '35 yesterday afternoon, the Levana Hockey team proved their mettle by holding the boys to a score of 8-3. The absence of their regular goalie, Margaret McGregor, partly accounted for the defeat. Dot Clemens, reliable defence player, also was unable to play. One-man rushes by Hamlin and Johnson kept the coeds on the defensive throughout the game. Leavens of Meds. '35 played goal for Levana, and seemed to find no trouble in moving the nets in all directions. The girls showed plenty of pep and should present a formidable line to the team from Keene on Saturday night. Margaret McGregor will be back in the nets, and the team will be out full force, with the probable exception of Dot Clemens, whose injury may prevent her from playing. The line-up for the game yesterday was:

Meds. '35—Elliott, goal; Johnson, Connors, wings; Hamlin, Teskey, defence; Ross, centre; Asselstine, Glass, subs.

Levana—Leavens (Meds. '35, goal; Jean Cameron, J. Stewart, wings; J. Nelson, Eileen Mason, defence; Marg. Chambers, centre; Ruby Cordy, Carmel Milne, subs.

Seniors Turn Tables On Gananoque Team

Emerging from the state of lethargy, which has surrounded them during the past few weeks, the Senior B. team suddenly came to life and played the hockey of which they are capable, but which has has been seldom seen recently. Gananoque, with a victory necessary for the possibility of a tie with Kingston, played every known brand of hockey from one man rushes to five man rushes, but to no avail, being unable to overcome the one goal lead scored by Lewis on a pass from Jimmy Arthurs in the first period of the game. The game was the most exciting seen in Gan. this year and the home town supporters, many of whom had "mushed" miles from the surrounding and outlying farms, "mushed" back to family stove quite satisfied that they had received their quarters' worth.

"Mac" Forsythe in goal was unbeatable and was responsible to a large extent for the game being on the right side of the line. Although, pucks came from every spot in the rink in the final period, "Mac" pushed, knocked, batted and threw them back into the faces of his baffled opponents. In front of him Storms and Kostnick supported him ably. While the forwards with an early goal to work on effectively guarded the slim lead.

"Junior" Lewis, recruited from the junior team to fill in "Haddy" Patterson's position on right wing, played an exceptionally fine game and scored the only goal of the game as a result of perfect team work on the part of Jimmy Arthurs.

work and instruction is looked after by Captain Barrett who has been with the School for twenty years.

At present there are around fifteen men enrolled in the course and shortly before the monthly examinations this number will increase to around twenty-five. The certificate of Coasting Master is the highest to be obtained at the School, permits the holder to sail along the coast to 40° South and North around to Hudson Bay. The lesser certificates include masters and pilots on smaller river and lake boats.

Little bothered by the bustling activity of the rest of University life, these future skippers and mates work industriously and quietly at their charts and maps and all the other paraphenalia that goes with navigation.

Use And Abuse Of Books Dealt With By Speaker

Hon. M. Burrell Says Neglect Of Books Is The Same As Abuse

"The abuse of books consists of their neglect" said Hon. Martin Burrell in his lecture on the "Use and Abuse of Books," in Convocation Hall yesterday.

The speaker laid down three rules for the proper use of books as volumes without regard to their literary value. "If the book is your own treat it as you wish, but there is a code of honor to be observed with borrowed books." This includes three "Dont's."

Don't turn down the leaves to mark the page.

Don't underline passages that appeal to you, or make comments.

Don't fail to return the books.

In speaking on the proper use of books in the literary sense, the speaker advised the audience that they must not accept books as a substitute for life. They must be related to the common experiences of humanity. A novel addict is like a drug addict and as soon as he unravels the plot of his book forgets everything about it. The love of books is an acquisition and not a gift.

Speaking of the enormously increased output of novels in recent years Mr. Burrell mentioned that two years ago between three and four thousand novels were produced in England. "It is said that every one has the material for a story in his life. Thank God," observed the speaker, "they don't all write it!"

"A man or woman should be permitted to browse widely in literary fields and in so doing he or she will become unconsciously capable of sound judgment in literary values." Because of their divergence of opinion, the speaker did not believe that reviews were particularly helpful, but on the contrary he thought they were likely to be confusing. A person should read what he likes best.

Tracing a connection between literature and politics and politicians, Mr. Burrell mentioned the work of Winston Churchill, which

Androcles And Lion Cast Now Complete

"Androcles and the Lion," the G. B. Shaw play now in preparation by the Dramatic Guild for the week following the Dramatic Festival is now fully cast and is rehearsing daily under the direction of Miss Vi. Kilpatrick.

Abe Zvonkin, middle wing and wrestler, will take the difficult part of Ferrovious. Art Sutherland's name was omitted from a previous announcement of the cast. He will play the Captain. Students are urged to keep this coming event in mind.

A schedule of rehearsals appears elsewhere in this issue.

Ticket Sale For Soph Year Dance Very Brisk

Sales of tickets have been brisk for the Arts '35 Year Dance according to Convener Ted Hughes. Yesterday afternoon the Journal learned that only a few tickets remained to be sold, as the committee had decided to limit the attendance, in order that none of the St. Valentines revellers enjoying the hospitality of Arts '35 at the La Salle Hotel to-night should suffer any inconvenience in any way of overcrowding.

Tickets may be obtained from members of the dance iommittee and cost $1.25 double.

Hon. M. Burrell Has Had Varied Career

Extension Lecturer Faced Many Dangers

By E. H. Gilmour

"I was nearly burnt to death in the Parliament Buildings fire, February 3rd, 1916," the Hon. Martin Burrell told me in an interview yesterday afternoon, recounting some of the exciting incidents of his interesting life. "As it was I had a very narrow escape indeed, "he went on; "and I was pretty much of a wreck for some months afterwards."

"No, the cause of the fire was never discovered," he continued, in answer to my question. "Of course many attributed it to German incendiarism, but that charge was not proven, and I myself doubt it. I believe that it was due to some smoker's carelessness with a match or a lighted cigarette."

The difficulties of canvassing a constituency seven hundred miles long and two hundred miles wide were recalled by Mr. Burrell as he spoke of the days when he was Member of Parliament for the British Columbia constituency of Yale, Carbiou. "I remember holding a political meeting at Ashcroft," he said, "and sweating in the hot sun when it was well over ninety degrees in the shade," and he went on, in reminiscent vein, to speak of his experiences in 1904-5, when,

Fast Water Polo Game Concluded Swimming Meet

Sensational Diving By Empire Champ Thrilled Spectators

Battling courageously against more experienced performers the Queen's senior water polo squad tied a classy Varsity team at the last swimming and diving extravaganza held here over the week-end. This peppy exhibition which ended with a score of 5-5 was but one of the features of the Meet, the most successful to date, for the crowd was treated by a sensational diving exhibition by Alfie Phillips, British Empire champion. The Queen's diving team also put on one of its finished displays, and the program was also enhanced by the water polo clash between Kingston All-Stars and Queen's seconds.

It goes without saying that the highlight of the evening was the exhibition put on by Phillips, who has held the British Empire championship for the last six years, and has twice entered the Olympics for Canada, placing 6th at Amsterdam in 1928, and 4th at Los Angeles last year.

Phillips' performance included a running front jack-knife dive, a back one and a half sommersault, a standing full gainor, a standing full twist, a running half gainor, a forward one and a half sommersault, a running forward two and a half sommersault, and one of his own dives—a twisting one and a half forward. Alfie went through this taxing repertoire with grace and consumate skill. The crowd was generous in its enthusiasm and applause.

By holding the Varsity aggregation to a 5-5 tie, the Queen's players showed that they are opponents for all-comers. Coming from behind on several occasions the Tricolor men showed plenty of fight and with a little luck might have overcome the visitors.

For Queen's the outstanding

"Man Is Always In Shadow Of The Skirt" Exclaims Leader In Co-Education Debate

"Man is always in the shadow of the skirt" announced Miss Dorel Smith, leader of the Government in a debate held at Ban Righ on Thursday evening, "Resolved that Co-education is a Failure". Co-education produces an undesirable type of student besides encouraging too much social life and preventing equality for both sexes. Miss Smith went on to describe the typical co-ed as having frizzed-hair, carmined lips and a baby stare, while the average college boy in co-educational institutions has slicked hair collegiate trousers, a flashy tie and lonesick eyes. College life is one mad round of "yards of neck and rivers of whiskey." Women are a distracting influence in lectures, labs., and especially the Library reading-room!

Women in colleges such as Queen's have their inferiority impressed on them at every turn. Athletics for women are woefully neglected. Their gymnasium equipment is inadequate and the men are favored in every way. Were it not for mixed classes freer discussions could be held in lectures. Miss Smith quoted H. L. Mencken as saying that the co-ed is a failure. "We are not at college to attend dances, but to get an education," she said. Graduates of women's colleges, while not spending all their time drinking and dancing, are not prudes—they are thoroughly nice girls.

Miss Dorothy Wilkins, leader of the opposition, stated that the success of Queen's graduates of both sexes has been, and always will be marked. Three women students

Japan In Manchuria To Be Debate Topic

Queen's Debaters Will Meet Ottawa Visitors

"Resolved that this house approves Japan's activities in Manchuria" is the subject of the Intercollegiate Debate between Ottawa University and Queen's which will take place at 8.15 p.m., February 16th, in Convocation Hall.

E. H. Gilmour and John Parker, upholding the affirmative side of the resolution, will represent Queen's.

The Sino-Japanese problem in relation to Manchuria is one of major importance at the present time, and is being dealt with in great detail by the League of Nations. The topic will surely prove an interesting one for all students.

The Queen's representatives are well known in debating circles. Both have represented Queen's on several occasions and it goes without saying that the subject will receive adequate treatment at their hands. The names of the Ottawa representatives are not known at present, but the local competitors are assured of spirited competition.

On the same night another team composed of Messrs. P. Stuchen and H. A. McLearn will meet Loyola College in Montreal. On this occasion the Queen's debaters will uphold the negative side of the resolution.

Women In Law To Be Theme Of Talk

The first of the series of Fireside Talks, which are held in Ban Righ Hall, will be given on Thursday, February 16th at 7.30 p.m., when Miss Vera J. Parsons, M.A., of the firm of Hoskins, Graham and Parsons, Toronto, will speak to the members of Levana on Law as a Profession for Women. Miss Parsons is a pioneer among women in the law practice, and will have an interesting story to tell of a woman lawyer's career.

The remaining talks in the Fireside Series will be given by women who have become prominent in Canadian professional circles. Their purpose is to give the members of Levana a wider view of the prospects in the professions open to women. Each of the talks will be followed by a round table discussion when the speaker will be delighted to give greater details of her particular subject.

Engineering Society

A general meeting of the Engineering Society will be held this afternoon at 4.15 P.M.

The matter of the recent calling of lectures will come up for discussion.

Masefield Will Read Salty Yarns Of The Sea

A salty yarn, the tang of the sea, the thrill of the chase, deep-felt sympathy and faith in what Life has to offer—this is the atmosphere that will greet those who will attend John Masefield's lecture-recital at the K.C.V.I. Auditorium to-morrow evening at 8.30 P.M.

Very few people, indeed, have not enjoyed his poems, but the English Poet Laureate has also made a name as a dramatist, historian, novelist and writer of short stories. Because of his naturalness and amiability Masefield excels as a reader, and English uttered by him is something that stirs his hearers. Mr. Masefield has the distinction of being the first English Poet Laureate to visit America with the object of speaking on the public stage.

As a poet he has always shown deep sympathy with the masses, while his love of the sea and the English countryside has amply been shown in his "Salt Water Ballads", "The Everlasting Mercy", and "The Widow in Bye Street." Proclaiming his championship of the despised and the rejected one of his poems reads: "Not the ruler for me, but the ranker, the tramp of the road, the slave with the sack on his shoulders, pricked on with the goad."

Like the great Conrad he spent the formative years of his life at sea, and he is said to owe much of his genius as a writer to the varied experiences of his early youth. Through periods in which the most menial tasks became his only means of subsistence the trend of his life took its chequered course. While assisting in a Greenwich saloon he managed to study classical verse in his garret. After returning to England he worked hard and persistently until he had scaled the literary heights.

For nearly thirty years Mr. Masefield has led a somewhat retired life at his country house near Oxford, where he has not only written books of verse but also many stories and other prose works. As a poet, however, he is best known, his verse having won for him world-wide fame. Among his best narrative poems are "The Widow in Bye Street", "Reynard the Fox", "The Everlasting Mercy", "Lollingdown Downs", and "Dauber."

Mr. Masefield is sure to be greeted by a record audience when he gives his readings here to-morrow evening.

Students are reminded that tickets are now on sale at the Queen's Post Office and may be procured for the sum of fifty cents.

How Can We Avoid Harmful Thoughts?

Dr. T. Davies Offered Solution At Service

"How can we escape from harmful thoughts?" It was upon this important problem that the speaker centred his address. "You will find the answer," said Dr. Trevor Davies, "In the First Epistle to the Philippians: 'Finally brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are of good report: if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things'."

"It is for leisure moments not for immediate action that St. Paul laid down this rule" continued Dr. Davies, "and few things are more certain in the future than that there shall be increased leisure for workers. Therefore it is the urgent duty of every nation to prepare citizens for leisure as well as for work."

"Our leisure thoughts are very influential. For the door of the mind is always open to the subconscious. Like the dark corners of a room lit by a lamp in the centre, we have dark thoughts which may be lighted at any moment, and forced upon our attention. Our unconscious mind is not dead, not a storeroom, but alive, a work shop by which our countless automatic actions are performed."

"What happens when the mind is at leisure? Often it present a morbid picture which would show the futility of life. This thought is the sin against the Holy Ghost, for Christ preached the real value of life. The influence of such thoughts, go as they may, remains. Buried thoughts have power to burst through the soil and bear fruit. But we must remember two things; first, that thoughts have power because of some natural instinct which is right (it is their perversion that is wrong); secondly, that we are not alone in our conflict, for such a conflict has been fought by some of the noblest people."

"What then is the cure for these evil thoughts?" First, practice ejaculative prayer, prayer that is as swift as the thought between question and answer. But you say that you don't feel like praying when you have an evil thought. Then open your eyes to God; He stands at the door,

Prof. G. H. Clarke To Speak On Masefield

Dr. G. H. Clarke of the English Department will deliver an address before the English Club Tuesday on John Masefield whose impending visit is arousing so much interest.

Dr. Clarke has met the poet-laureate on several occasions and therefore can be expected to have some revealing comments to make about Masefield himself as well as about his works.

The meeting will take place at 4 o'clock in the Red Room and the executive extends the usual invitation to all students irrespective of faculty to attend.

Welcome John Masefield

The most unusual and cherished event of the year should be the visit of John Masefield, England's Poet-Laureate and distinguished singer of sea sagas, who will appear in a lecture-recital at the Kingston Auditorium to-morrow evening. It will be long before a poet of Masefield's sincerity and accomplishment visits us again, unless he himself return.

Mr. Masefield has travelled extensively and perhaps, in justice to him, we should say that he has been everywhere and seen everything worth seeing. He has lived much and that courageously. From obscure beginnings, through periods in which his tasks ranged from assistant to a bar-tender to the Poet-Laureateship of England, the chapters of his eventful life have succeeded themselves. And now we are to be privileged to spend a couple of hours with him, listening to the simply told tales of his experiences, tales vividly, yet quietly and sincerely related in the entrancing manner of a gifted story-teller of some ancient time. Following these stories he will introduce to his audience some of his favorite poems, so characteristically honest, rugged and British in their every word. No doubt, he will read from "Cargoes" and "Spanish Waters," two of his most successful poems which appeal to the courage and strength of the listener or reader, perhaps in a greater degree than any other of his works.

Selections from "Reynard the Fox" will most assuredly be included in his readings, for here the English countryside is admirably pictured. The hounds, the shouting riders, the panting horses and the sly fox all help to transport the listener in fancy to the English country, where the chase is painted with poignacy, forcefulness and sympathy. "He had run his best, but the hounds ran the better," the poem reads. Who cannot help feeling a touch of sadness, perhaps of tragedy, at this moment? We may find an inkling of Masefield's philosophy in these simple words.

Masefield's songs have a rugged and virile penchant which cannot but find favour with the disciples of the present day literary school. Commenting upon this characteristic of Masefield's work the "Brooklyn Daily Eagle", New York, has the following to say:

"Years ago Masefield expressed the hope that poetry would one day take its place 'with other delights of the market place.' He has himself made it a delight to the fo'c'sle and quarterdeck, the countryside and the salon. Wherever the wine of the sea exalts the heart of men, Masefield speaks to those whose ears can hear the subtle sounds that are life, sounds fine and clear that rise above the gales."

"The Providence Journal" has the following to say in part: "Masefield stood before us undisguised and undisturbed, the greatest and simplest Englishman of his time. He is great because he is simple. He is simple because he is great." This is surely a fine tribute, and in our minds goes a long way in explaining his charm as a writer. It is indeed refreshing to find in this maelstrom of economic disorder, someone whose simplicity and utter disregard for so-called sophistication in this dance-mad age afford those who come in contact with him a respite from the cares and struggle for existence—which for want of a better word, we call "life", and Henry James has more appropriately called "a predicament."

We should all be thankful for this opportunity of hearing John Masefield. And at this time we are happy to say: "Welcome, Mr. Masefield!"

Spongers

Students are inclined to shrink at the mention of a parasite or a "sponger" as one who feeds upon the fat of others. Yet in this university (as in most others too) the "sponger" is a well known personage, although the idea of being such does not occur to him as readily as it does to others. This character has come to college with the purpose of loafing and having a good time. Being naturally lazy and victim to a peculiar form of procrastinateism, he takes no notes in class. About the time of examinations (as many students learned last week) he is especially active and likewise very annoying and vexatious to those who have gone to the great trouble of taking notes in their lectures.

His methods of approach are usually varied but the ultimate result is always the same. He first approaches in a casual manner and speaks in general terms concerning the weather or other matters of trivial importance. At this stage he will probably offer you a cigarette and, in some cases, might even go so far as to ask you to have lunch with him. This unusual kindness generally arouses the victim's suspicions, which are finally realized when the "sponger", giving some pitiful excuse about the brevity or complete lack of his notes, asks in gracious tones for a loan of the other's.

His excuses are likewise varied but all resolve themselves to the same thing. Perhaps he will be truthful enough to say that he was too lazy to take notes, but the more common excuse is that he was absent from several lectures or was unable to take any because of a "sore finger." It is fairly difficult to refuse such a request and the victim usually, with an inward sigh, complies. The "sponger" then promises to be very careful with the notes and to return them in a few days. Then saying farewell, and adding many effusive ejaculations as to his gratitude, takes his leave.

These spongers do not realize what trouble and annoyance they cause others and likewise what harm they inflict on themselves. Students do not like to lend their notes or their text books because they usually wish to use them themselves, especially since the "sponger" launches his semi-annual attack about examination time. Besides nobody likes to see a person taking advantage of work that has been done by somebody else. The sponger is likewise inflicting harm on himself, for not only does he usually fail in his exams, or barely manages to pass them, but he becomes so accustomed to depending on the work of somebody else, that when he goes out into the world expecting everybody to likewise assist him, he receives a rude shock. His college career instead of furnishing him with self-reliance, as it is normally supposed to do, has actually in his case warped this quality, with the result that he finds it doubly hard to get on when he leaves the university. Such a person is a menace, and the sooner he gets wise to himself, the better it will be for everybody.

Habit

It has been said that if an idiot were to tell you the same story every day for a year, you would end by believing him, the theory being that habit is the deepest law of human nature. However, there are habits, not only of lying, swearing, and drinking, but of every modification of action, speech, and thought. At all times we are following the influence which will presently shape our destiny. We are choosing our habits, our associates, our traits and our homes. In a word, man is a bundle of habits, and there is not a quality or function, either of body or mind, which does not feel the influence of this great law of animated nature.

We must always think: would a consistent train of my usual thoughts be either worthy of me or useful to me? Would a consistent reign of my present spirit and desires please or satisfy me? Would an eternal course of my habitual conduct bring happiness or even bear reflection?

Form your habits carefully. They are soon assumed, but when you try to strip them off, it is like being flayed alive.

A Courageous Writer

No "Idle singer of an empty day" is Upton Sinclair. He is one of the few living writers who combines extraordinary literature talents with fearlessness and a desire to better the existence of America's masses. He has sacrificed personal gains that his books might be owned by the multitudes, for each person who reads his powerful logic and carefully-prepared facts is a prospective convert to Upton Sinclair's way of thinking.

His books are more than literary masterpieces. They are weapons to right wrong. They do more than entertain. They inform. Throughout his entire career he has struggled valiantly against overwhelming odds, but he succeeded in accomplishing many attainments. Almost three decades ago his book, "The Jungle," aided materially in the passage of the pure food laws. His scrupulous investigation of the Colorado coal strike in 1913 focused the attention of the nation on the affair and brought encouraging results.

In the "Goose-Step" and the "Goslings" he revealed many incongrons and deplorable situations in education and succeeded in bringing about the solution of a considerable number of them. Always courageous, never selfish, Upton Sinclair stands virtually alone as a great writer who has had the character and fortitude to bring down upon his head the wrath and displeasure of millions of reactionaries in his battle to relieve the oppressed of the nation.

Perhaps Upton Sinclair is too one-sided in his views and hopes. Perhaps the perspective from which he surveys conditions is not a fair one. Both reflections are open to controversy. But, regardless of the validity of his arguments, one cannot but admire the man who stands back of them. The courage and unselfishness that Upton Sinclair has shown are rare enough in this day of greed and backwardness to be worthy of praise and commendation.

And, there is this for us to remember. The more public men there are like Upton Sinclair, the sooner will liberalism become a reality, and in no place is liberalism more essential than in the colleges and universities of our country.

On Wagging One's Tail

(The Argosy Weekly)

Do you talk, or do you merely wag your tail? This may be a rather startling and amusing way of expressing the matter, but the question is suggested by some assertions made by Dr. Charles Platt in his most excellent book "The Psychology of Thought and Feeling" a book which students in General Psychology would do well to read.

Using the word in its strict sense, "speech" is solely a human acquirement. We speak somewhat loosely of "animal language" and include in that term not only audible sounds, but the whole range of actions and attitudes which living creatures, other than human, employ as modes of expression. Many animals, birds and insects, are highly endowed in this direction, though there seems to be a tendency on the part of some observers to deduce more than their observations warrant.

In reading Maeterlinck's "Life of the Bee" for instance, one is often in doubt as to where one should draw the lines between science and poetry, between fact and its sublimation. On the other hand, those who have the opportunity of observing animal life are left in no doubt as to the remarkable powers which many creatures possess for giving expression to their desires and emotions. This is true in the highest degree of animals which have become domesticated, especially those kept as household pets. The cat arches its back and lashes its tail to express fear and anger. The dog conveys the whole gamut of emotions in its voice, from the short, sharp bark of welcome to the whine of pain and the growl which heralds attack. Its tail is almost as eloquent as its head. Many other illustrations might be drawn from bird and insect life, and continued observation under varying circumstances has led us to the interpretation of these signs.

But while we fully realize the wonderful powers of expression possessed by many creatures, we recognize that there is a sharp dividing line between animal language and human speech. Animal language has its basis in instinct and emotion. Speech is (or ought to be) expressive of thought and reason. Yet while the animal cannot rise to the acquirement of speech, is there not a danger today that the human may degrade his powers to the level of animal language?

Barry Pain tells of a sailor, who, his vessel having been wrecked, was lost upon an uninhabited island, where for ten years he lived in solitude. At last a ship came to harbour under the shelter of the island, and a boatload of men went ashore. The sailors argued that the hairy and unkempt creature who ran down to the shore to meet them was an ape. The ape-like one, on the contrary, fearful of being shot, was anxious to prove otherwise. But he had been speechless for so long that words at first failed him. After a struggle, he managed to blurt out the two words he had been in the habit of using most before his isolation, and which were, consequently, the first to come back to his memory. Barry Pain does not say what the two words were but they were sufficient to convince the sailors that "here was no ape, but a Christian and a brother." Whereupon he was taken aboard and returned home to civilization.

There is a real danger to-day, however, lest without going through such hazardous experiences, we should lose the finer uses of speech by sheer carelessness, or even laziness. This is unfortunately, true even of our universities—the seats of learning of the world. A boy and a girl, college undergraduates, entering a Sackville hosier's shop a few days before this essay was written, asked to see some neckties. (A birthday was evidently in the offing.) Several were displayed and after a few minutes of indecision the girl made her choice.

Holding up the selected tie for her companion's admiration, she exclaimed "I think this one is simply heavenly!" If the article under discussion had been skyblue in colour, there might have been some excuse for the adjective employed. But as it was of red knitted silk, even that measure of appropriateness was denied it.

We have all met people whose stock of adjectives appears to be limited to two, one of which is used to express approval and the other digust. There are those for instance, who express all pleasurable emotion by the word "beautiful." Degrees of pleasing emotion are denoted by the way it is pronounced. If the superlative is required it becomes "bee-yeetiful," with the first syllable accented and prolonged. In the same way, disapproval may find invariable expression in the term "wet". Others fasten upon a different pair of adjectives to serve the same purpose. "Glorious" may be the favourable yet ill-used word, with "terrible" as its antonym, or perchance "splendid" and "horrid."

From time to time new words become the popular vogue—Americanisms and slang phrases—and to avoid the charge of being a "back number" they are ever on the tip of our tongues. "Toppin'" or "top-hole"; "first rate" or "great"; "cute" or "okay"; have recently served to describe any pleasing experience from a tour around the world to an S.C.A. Tea.

It is this habit which Dr. Platt describes metaphorically as "wagging one's tail." We cannot deny that the metaphor is justified. The danger of the habit arises from its narrowing effect upon thought and judgment and the loss of the ability to express one's ideas with fulness and accuracy. It is a degradation of language and a trailing in the dust of one of life's choicest gifts. The preponderance of American literature—text-books, novels and magazines—in our reading, and the baneful effect of the popular talkie film, have undoubtedly sadly debased our speech and corrupted our manners. Let us cease wagging our tails.

Preparations Completed For French Club Concert

All is in readiness for the concert to be put on to-morrow afternoon in Convocation Hall by the French Club. As announced previously the program will consist of French and French-Canadian songs. Besides solos there will also be several unison songs. Some of the old favorites like "Au Clair de la Lune," "Vive la Canadienne," and "Dans les Chantiers" cannot fail to prove highly interesting for any audience.

Among the performers who will take part in this concert are Mesdames Frances Robertson, Lottie Wyatt. Denise Chabot and Agnes Brehner, and Messieurs T. F. Gelley, A. Davies, A. Tremblay, and J. Fortin.

The piano music will be executed by the Misses Lois Baker, B. Agnes.

There is no admission charge. The concert will start at 4 p.m.

Co-eds Explain What A Girl Should Know

Before entering college a girl should know how to make a man either kiss her or not kiss her.

That was the conclusion of one freshman coed at Syracuse university in partial answer to a questionnaire submitted her by Dr. Eugenie A. Leonard of Teachers College. The questionnaire was part of a study conducted recently by Dr. Leonard concerning problems of freshmen girls at college.

In reply to a question asked 203 freshmen coeds as to what mother thought of petting, smoking, using make-up and falling in love, they said that mama told them the "facts of life", and with only a word of caution, sent them to college.

To the question: "Have you ever been in love?", 62 girls said "No"; 21, "Once"; 43, "Twice"; and 56 asserted, "Many times." 133 tell their mothers all about their affairs while 41 do not. In addition 126 coeds claimed their mothers agreed with their views on petting and necking, while 47 said their mother didn't get their point of view.

In a voluntary statement made by 177 coeds it was disclosed that 73 knew about sex, 59 knew how to go about with boys, 27 knew about petting, 3 knew enough not to pet, while only one knew how to pet.

A summary of the things every girl should know before coming to college, according to the survey, included these 10 points:

1. That she will be disillusioned about life and college.
2. How to be refined, "not the rah-rah type."
3. Everything about sex.
4. How to dance, smoke, drink and neck; and what these things are like.
5. Common principles of hygiene.
6. Not to be vulgar; "whether or not she is going to give away her favors promiscuously."
7. How to develop will power and resistance.
8. How to live with other people, mend clothes, dress, handle money.
9. How to act with "lit" men.
10. "That life is just give and take." —U. of Washington, N.Y.

Man Is Always In Shadow Of Skirt Says Dorel Smith

when consulted stated that they came to Queen's because they never thought of coming anywhere else, because the fees were so reasonable and because extra-mural courses here were the finest to be had. If co-education had not brought these women to Queen's, why should it keep them away? Queen's has all the advantages of segregated institutions. Levana has every advantage, the Faculty take an active interest in all. Women have beautiful residence, supervised boarding-house, and their own Dean.

"Professors in general prefer to lecture to mixed classes. "Miss Wilkins continued. "The suggestion that mixed classes put a restraint on students of both sexes is a fallacy. Even if the presence of co-eds, in lectures should make men reluctant to express opinions, mixed classes are the very place for people such as they are. The world of business has no time for people who are restrained." Even our principal staunchly upholds co-education, urging that co-education is not a Canadian tradition.

Mr. Waisberg, second speaker for the government, emphatically declared that successful graduates would have attained the same heights anyway, because success was inherent in their individual natures. He went on to say that Professors found that they could not express themselves freely in classes because of the presence of the female element. Co-education is a failure as far as mutual advantages are concerned because the men and women are not even brought together. Women live in residences or supervised boarding-houses, while men exist in solitariness at the mercy of Kingston's landladies. Women and men are segregated in the classroom, at meals and at all times. There is so little opportunity for them to make each other's acquaintance that it is negligible. Women, as a rule, have more expensive tastes than the average man at college can cope with, if only in regard to his pocket-book.

Mr. Wallace, as second speaker for the opposition said that the co-education of yesterday may have been a failure, but is no longer such. Neither the students, professors nor alumni have demanded a change. Such a problem as the failure of co-education has never before been considered. It is admitted that some students get too much social life—but that too is inherent in their natures. The majority, however, do not get enough. Queen's attempts to socialize the students which, after all is part of their education. The college develops co-operation, understanding and respect. Segregated men's colleges were founded on a fear of women while women's colleges were the obvious protest against exclusion from the former. Marriages between graduates of co-educational institutions are infinitely more successful than any others, because men and women understand each other better and have come to know each other better at college.

At this juncture a sensation arose when a new "Proto-Surrealist" party was introduced by Messrs. John Parker and Eric Gilmour, who explained the platform of this party as follows: "We believe that the present co-educational system is a failure! What we need is radical change. Let us destroy the old traditions in one clean sweep and re-establish co-education on a new basis of co-operation! Let us have co-operative boarding houses and co-educational residences where men and women live side by side, where they can learn to understand and know each other better, so that after graduation they may be more successful in the outside world!" Both speakers for this new party held the House in breathless attention. At last someone had faced the facts! At last someone had offered the logical solution to the problem of co-education. The House sat on the edge of its chair, its neck craned and it ears cocked so that not one word of these new and foolproof arguments could be missed. Supporters have since appeared in overwhelming numbers, re-inforced by even more proofs of the success of such a movement. Even the "writer of these columns" has joined the ranks of the Proto-Surrealists and has made many conversions.

After the bedlam which arose had subsided somewhat a vote was taken, regardless of the obvious success of the new party to the effect that Miss Wilkins and her colleague, Mr. Wallace, had won the issue. Co-education is not a failure!

Hon. Martin Burrell Has Had Varied Adventures from his headquarters at Nelson, he went up and down the country on a political campaign." "In those days the C.P.R. was the only railway available, for the C.N.R. came through much later," he explained, "and I had to cover a great deal of territory behind a team of horses."

"It was back in 1886," Mr. Burrell declared, in answer to my question regarding the time that he was shipwrecked on his way to Canada. "I was returning from England with my wife on the S.S. 'Oregon', one of the biggest liners of those days. We were wrecked on Fire Island, about seventy miles out from New York. Everyone aboard was saved, but we all lost everything we had with us, and were stranded in New York."

Mr. Burrell has a rich store of reminiscences of books and authors, and I was fortunate to hear some of them from him. The melancholy of Thomas Hardy in his later years was probably increased by the company of his second wife, who herself possessed a rather melancholy disposition. Mr. Burrell remarked, as he passed from one author to another, including in his field of observation such various writers as Scott, Dickens, George Eliot, Henry James, Sir James Barrie, Mrs. Hardy, and Mr. E. V. Lucas.

In a final word Mr. Burrell recalled his visit to Queen's in 1919 when he accompanied the Prince of Wales, and mentioned that until now he had not subsequently visited the University, except in 1928 when he was the recipient of an honorary degree.

UNIVERSITY OF OREGON —Dr. James H. Gilbert, dean of the college of social science, received a letter from a Los Angeles business firm offering to buy the University for cash.

McGILL UNIVERSITY—Contests are being sponsored by the University to secure from student contributions a marching song to be used by the band and several student songs to be used at athletic games.

THE CAMPUSCOPE

Love

As a mental derangement love is not an infectious disease, but considerable evidence has been accumulated to support the theory that it is contagious. The disease is endemic in torrid, frigid and intermedate climates, and flares up into great pandemics in dry Spring seasons.

The morbidity, recorded over a period of aeons, is about one hundred per cent; the mortality rate is nil, some thousands of fiction fabricators to the contrary notwithstanding. Even a severe attack does not, as was at one time supposed, confer any lasting immunity against further prostrations Man's chronic inability to remember the unpleasant phases of a past experience leads him to disregard the necessity of prophylactic precautions, and even to court disaster again and again.

The incidence seems to be about equal in the two sexes, but females show a higher degree of resistance in that they recover more readily and apparently suffer less from permanent effects. At no period of life is man completely exempt from danger, but during the completely adult years he is less likely to contract the ailment. It is during the adolescent period that, when the reasoning processes are so completely subjugated by the newly awakened emotions, that the trouble appears — then and during the second period of thoughtless youth which immediately precedes the second childhood, known everywhere as the dangerous age.

In spite of industrious research, the aetiology is not at present clearly understood. Very frequently the affectation appears as the fortuitous accompaniment of a healthy biological attraction. It seldom lasts beyond the early, futile stages of such an episode, and usually clears up rapidly under proper eliminative treatment.

The symptoms are variable in different individuals but present with a fair degree of constancy, a recognisable general pattern. The chief diagnostic signs are a tense vacuity of facial expression, borne out by other evidences of an absent mind, insomnia, a morbid tendency to indulgence in high-flown day-dreams, and a fatuous attribution to the heavenly bodies of direct powers over the minds and affairs of men.

When these signs are present, the diagnosis is usually easy. Chronic witlessness must be carefully differentiated. In this latter condition the patient has usually learned that he is slightly different from his fellow men, and has developed a system of deportment calculated to conceal his infirmity so that he should be easily distinguishable from the victim of a temporary lunacy who feels no such need of artifice.

The treatment of an established case is entirely palliative. Administration of large doses of strychnine, repeated until the desired result has been freely recommended by some authorities, but while such treatment may indeed bring the disease to an end, and while it undoubtedly produces a happy psychological effect on the friends and relatives, it is hardly likely to be of lasting benefit to the patient. Indeed, no drug may be regarded as specific for this type of disorder. The fever runs its course and abates in the due course of events, leaving the patient not much weakened, and, unfortunately, seldom much wiser. As in so many other diseases, mild attacks in early life may leave behind them some degree of resistance. While few healthy people ever acquire a really lasting immunity, those who survive repeated attacks become tolerant so that they escape in later years with a relatively mild form, known as philandrosis.

Parents frequently make the mistake of sheltering children and young people from all possible danger. Children so protected have naturally, no acquired resistance and when they inevitably escape the parental fold as adult adolescents, they invariably contract the disease in its most enervating form the first time they are exposed to it. Such attacks are serious because, while the issue is never fatal, the victim may be incapacitated for all forms of serious work or play for a considerable period.

The systemic effects are secondary to the original mental lesion which is incurable, and will probably remain incurable until such time as man becomes either a wholly national or completely irrational animal.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Dear Mr. Editor:

I hear that a new party advocating more intimate contacts between men and women students has been projected upon us. I pray and beseech you to use your influence to kill this many headed hydra in the bud. I wonder if these fellows who are so glibly recommending these revolutionary departures ever lived with women upon the friendly terms they anticipate. Now I have seven sisters and believe me my illusions about the female sex have been shattered forever. Wait until these champion debaters and party founders get their new state of affairs organized and then see if they don't want to revert to the old system.

These seven sisters of mine led me a dog's life until I came to Queen's. Now I fear that my sanctuary is going to be invaded again and see no hope for ever developing any individuality if I am to be penned in close confinement with any gang of female relation-improvers. If the movement succeeds I'll even go so far as to enroll at Varsity. These Utopian debaters may think their scheme is O.K. but wait until it begins to work. I bet all their ideas about free and equal rights and privileges go up the spout like a student's cash goes when he starts paying his fees in the fall. Take it from me, Ed., women are all very well when you regard them from a distance but when they get you in their clutches you have not got much more chance of survival than a Klu Klux in Liberia. The only hope for the future, so far as I can see it is that these advocates of more friendly relations will be speedily disillusioned when they find that women are not the trusting gentle creatures they think but are really dangerous.

Those remarks about the baby stairs are all O.K. Better baby stairs and the present carmine lipped era of women in colleges and all the so-called restrictions than a planned Utopia where a fellow won't be able to call his life his own. In closing I might mention that a famous guy named Kipling uttered some valuable advice about the female of the species and I think that his remarks are still applicable. She IS the fiercest of the species.

Yours,

Brother of Seven.

Daughter of Mark Twain Starts 'Power Movement'

New York—Mark Twain took delight in satirizing faith-healers, but recently his daughter, Clara Clemens, announced the founding of a new metaphysical school of thought through which she hopes woman will "bring about a universal resolution and end the chaos we are living in."

Miss Clemens, the wife of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit symphony orchestra, called her movement the "power movement." She has based it on "all the philosophies of the East, ancient and modern, and some of the essential truths of several."

It is not a religion, Miss Clemens explains. "Rather do I envision it as a way of life which through the medium of small groups will spread to cover the world."

May it be known, unto all those who were really helped — those whose interest was awakened—and those who still lament that they missed our week-end conference of Jan. 15th, that we have another high experience ahead of us.

Next week-end, Feb. 19th, Dr. Earnest Thomas, Toronto, will be with us.

"Christian Marriage and Before" and "Ways of Knowing God" are two of the subjects in which he will lead discussions.

Dr. Thomas is well known throughout Canada as one of the keenest minds of the day, and it is with much pleasure that we herald his coming. We advise you to watch The Journal and bulletin board for further notice.

Furthermore let no one think the S.C.M. (Student Christian Movement) is an organization for theologs. It is a student organization whose purpose it is to introduce to the students, discussions, on present day problems, with a view of leading us to realize that Religion saves us to life in its best.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Monday, Feb. 13th.

Dear Mr. Editor:

The ranks of the new Proto-Surrealist party have been swelled tremendously in the last few days. Another ardent recruit has joined the supporters of the new movement. I mean-myself. The fact that I was not present at the debate on Thursday evening last will remain one of the greatest disappointments in my life.

I have now, however, a new impetus to drive me on a new goal! I too believe that our present co-educational system is a dismal failure. I too uphold the principle of drastic re-organization! We do need co-operative boarding houses, better social contacts and the enlargement of knowledge gained by experience. Evils cannot flourish unless restricted and forced into underground channels. Away with Mrs. Grundy and the burden of inhibitions and rotten conventions under which we are staggering. Freer social intercourse is our one salvation. Men and women must live side by side under the same conditions in order to prepare themselves for their struggle in the world around them. They must understand each other! There is no need to consider immorality for it will die a natural death. Our new life will be one of sympathetic understanding, honesty, square-dealing, moderation—even in dancing.

And so, Mr. Editor, with gratitude in my heart for being allowed this small space in which to tell the world of Proto-Surrealism and my support I would urge everyone who reads this epistle to consider the matter carefully. One cannot but admire those intrepid men who unfearing of public opinion announced with conviction their new drive towards the goal of Realism. I am proud to be one of them and unhesitatingly admire their courage and right-mindedness.

Most gratefully yours,

—"Emendator."

Pittsburgh Questionnaire Reveals Champion Egotist

A recent questionnaire of the Pitt Weekly did not decide which University of Pittsburgh student is mostly likely to succeed, but it provided an interesting sidelight on college English—and egotism.

"The bozo you're looking at," was the direct answer of one student to the question, "In your opinion, what Pitt student is most likely to succeed after graduation?"

This student backed his modest judgment with the assertion that "If innate ability, baloney, hooey and a good line mean anything, watch out for me."

But this student was matched in modesty, at least, by another one, who wrote shrinkingly: "Me. I'm going to be the big knock-them-cold. Who am I? Oh, just a distinguished bum!"

Of co-eds nominated for future achievement, it was written that one ought to "crash" Broadway, another "ought to snag 'em some way," while a third "was a knockout in the Angel skin lace gown at the style parade."

Reasons ascribed for the success of some of the men included that they possessed "what it takes" or "the hocko that it takes." Orders were a "sure shot," or "going to hog it all."

"I AM A FUGITIVE FROM A CHAIN GANG" with Paul Muni.

Paul Muni scores again as he depicts the agonizing mental and physical torture of a convict in the much-heralded production, "I Am A Fugitive From a Chain Gang."

Jim Allan (Paul Muni) returns from the war with a definite idea as to how his life should be lived. In his attempt to accomplish this he falls into a trap set by one of his loager-pals and he is then sentenced to ten years in the chain gang. Spurred on to escape by the horrible conditions in this gang, Allan makes his getaway and establishes himself successfully in Chicago. Allen is found out by a cheap woman, whom he of necessity marries. After he falls in love with another woman his wife exposes him to the authorities. Allen is sent back to the prison with the state's promise that he should be pardoned in ninety days because he had become an excellent citizen in Chicago. Once back in the gang, the state refuses his pardon and he's compelled to serve his term. Successful in another escape, Allen is forced to live the rest of his life as a hunted fugitive.

This story was written to expose the cruelty and brutality of a chain gang and it has appealed tremendously to the emotional public. There is action, pathos, and reality in this gripping production with Paul Muni at his best. If you can stand intensive, nerve-racking excitement, don't miss this. A.

AT THE TIVOLI

THE MATCH KING
with
Warren William, Lily Damita, Juliette Compton and others.

"The Match King is based on the career of one of the most extraordinary figures in modern finance. When Ivar Kreuger committed suicide in Paris, not long ago, startling revelations began to seep out concerning hitherto unsuspected activities of this man who had led such "a strange," hypocritical life. There remains yet much to be told: the unbelievable deceptions he practiced on some of the leading financial wizards of the world, the colossal enterprises which he launched with cool disregard of possible consequences, his amazing impersonations, the cynical fact that he had a mistress in every capital, while supposedly an ascetic.

Warren William plays the titular rôle with fine ability. His creation of an exacting character is as authentic as one could wish. He is ably supported by the women who flit ephemeral as moths, across the reels of the match king's precarious career.

This talkie is to be recommended; it has the merit of being interesting. B+.

Music Lovers Heard Beethoven Symphony

Principal and Mrs. W. Hamilton Fyfe opened their home to twenty-five or more members of the Music Club last Thursday night. Everybody enjoyed themselves very much. We grouped ourselves around an open fire in the living room and listened to Beethoven's Dance Symphony, his great Seventh Symphony. Dr. Frost was present and had some interesting things to say on the music. He doubted whether those who had never heard the Seventh Symphony would get much enjoyment out of it. For one never got the thrill of really hearing music like this until one had listened many many times. The music must first become part of oneself. After playing over the record which illustrated the themes, Dr. Frost commented on the extraordinary simplicity of the themes on which great music so often is based. These themes are often simple scale forms which, however, are capable of creating great emotional effect as the deep descending scale in Tzschaskorsky's Pathetique which seems like all the tears of humanity. It was at the height of his career that Beethoven wrote his Seventh Symphony. We who had never heard it before were struck at least by the vivacity, vitality with which the movements sweep along.

Then we heard a Fantasie by Chopin played on the piano by Harold Bauer, one of the loveliest things ever composed for piano. Jack MacPhail on the flute and E. McGill on the guitar gave us a duet arrangement from the Garotte of Lulli. The final number was Schubert's Trio for cello, violin and piano. The Second Movement is very beautiful.

The next meeting will be held at John Stevenson's, 277 Earl Street, at 7.30 p.m. Thursday, February 16th.

"FAMILY HISTORY"
By V. Sackville-West
(Hogarth Press)

Following closely in the wake of her two successful novels, "The Edwardians" and "All Passion Spent," Miss Vita Sackville-West offers a third, and unfortunately a much inferior creation. "Family History" we firmly believe has little of the appeal and splendid merits of her previous offerings.

Miss Sackville-West is one of the notable Bloomsbury group of writers, another member of which is that brilliant novelist and critic, Virgina Wolff. We have liked the author of "Family History" so far, because, although as distinctly modern and refreshing in her interpretation as Mrs. Wolff, at the some time she is quite free from the elusive and obscure aethetic impressionism of her talented colleague. Her clean fragile prose and the exquisite subtlety of her understanding have up until now delighted us. But in her present book we are somewhat disheartened.

Of aristocratic lineage herself, Miss Sackville-West, gave superb characterizations of the young and passionate duke in "The Edwardians," and of the old and weary Countess in "All Passion Spent." These she limned so delicately and yet so fully and with such poignant comprehension as to be remarkable. They seemed to be a very part of her own person so sympathetically did she present them. On this occasion in portraying the middle-class Jarrold family, it would appear as though she has gone beyond the immediate range of her power and experience.

The story is a slim one, too slim and chimera-like, it might reasonably be objected. Old Mr. Jarrold, humbly born, has, by sheer ability, and industry, amassed a great fortune and in consequence is prominent enough to receive a peerage. Evelyn, his daughter-in-law, also not gently-born, is in love with the distinguished Miles Vane-Merrick, who is fifteen years her junior. There is little else in our opinion, by way of a "plot", save the rather tedious and limp description of Evelyn's death and of her several visits to the Jarrold home or her lover's castle.

Evelyn and her futile romance are fairly well represented. Apart from the brief entrances of Lady Viola Auquetil, she is the only thorough character anywhere in the entire book. But even with her, Miss Sackville-West misses much through a lack of personal interest or appreciation. The fact of Evelyn and the Jarrolds being "middle-class", or "nouveaux riches" or "parvenus" is too frequently stressed and with some superiority we decided. Their creator does not reach any satisfaetory depths in depicting them. They, as comparative strangers receive a slightly sardonic treatment, veined from time to time with a certain refined contempt.

"Family History" is more or less interesting and in part, quite good. The style, ever chaste and unobtrusive, maintains a high excellence, without equalling some other of the writer's work. The innovation of "thatt" for "that", is amusing, difficult at times and no great improvement we would aver. In the future, could we not have a story with wider possibilities or else a richer more knowledgable backgronnd?

In One Ear

By Outis

A movie scenario touch was injected into the student revelry at Kingston's pocket-edition Night Club early Sunday morning.

* * * *

The place was raided by local police.

* * * *

While the dance was broken up it was difficult to quell the merrymaking, the guests insisting on singing.

* * *

The Science Formal went off as scheduled — Wine, Women, Song and Hangovers.

* * * *

The broadcast was quite successful—except for the amateurish "faux-pas" of signing off at 12, midnight, and then carrying on for twenty minutes longer.

* * * *

"Outis" is glad to report that the campaign he instituted against the "Kingston Crouch" is bearing fruit.

* * * *

Fewer dancers have been seen engaging in that hideous style which has no place in dancing.

* * * *

But the writer is grieved by the apparent unconcern of a few people who still insist on doing the "Crouch."

* * * *

There is one thing to be thankful for, however. There are some people who are taking these remarks seriously, as they should, and are taking the means to eradicate the "Kingston Crouch" from our ballrooms.

* * * *

Just look around, dear readers, "Outis" is in good company today—music to the right of us, music to the left of us, books and talkies complete the picture.

* * * *

We have a hold-up man in our midst.

* * * *

The "taking" lad lifted a pouch containing an appreciable sum from the check room on the evening of the Science Formal.

* * * *

The culprit is known, and things will happen soon if he doesn't return the pouch and equivalent contents to the Queen's Post Office.

Four Oil Paintings By Gissing On Exhibition

Four paintings in oils by Roland Gissing are at present being exhibited by the University. Two of these are hung in the Douglas Library, in the offices of the librarian, and two in the Red Room.

Mr. Gissing, who is one of the most distinguished of Canada's younger artists, lives in Cochrane, Alberta, and most of his pictures deal with prairie landscapes and skyscapes. His work is characterized by a depth of feeling for colour and tone values.

MUSIC

So captured was I by the beauty of the music and the graceful abandon with which it was played that I would not grasp to the full the perfect technique of Madame Hornyansky and Scott Malcolm. "Abandon" I think is the word. The 'cellist played her instrument as if it were a giant toy with which she might do what she pleased, the pianist accomplished difficult passages as if the piano were setting him in motion and not he the piano.

After an arrangement for 'cello from Bach's Third Sonata in G Minor for Viola di Gamba the artists played Brahm's 2nd Sonata in F Major. The First Movement swept in passionately like the first movement of Brahm's Third Symphony; towards its close there was a passage where softly searchingly the notes of the 'cello played over the rich chords of the piano. That peace which pervaded Brahm's life seemed to emanate from the slow movement (Adagio). Majestically, as if beauty were a thing to worship and venerate. The pizzicatos of the 'cello led on the theme played by the piano. I have noticed in both Dvorak and Brahms that irresistable rhythm with which their music seems to flow; so it was in this movement.

My fancy plays puckishly with me when I listen to new music. So in the third movement I seemed to see a grove in spring "fanning its dewey leaves" with joy; then after this fleeting vision came the wistfulness of the second theme which seemed to tell that summer's beauties are fleeting. Soft runs of the piano sounded like leaves falling, falling . . . Then with notes of joyous hope, stronger than ever came the first theme and seemed to say with Petulengro, 'Life is very sweet brother, who would wish to die?' To my untutored ear the fourth movement sounded in many places like an English folk song written long ago.

"Grieg's music is all the same," said Scott Malcolm after the concert. After that I felt free to say just what I thought and I had some queer ideas. There is in this Grieg Sonata, however, an intense national spirit, not merely that of Norway, but that of any nation. It was unmistakable in that stirring march theme which opened the first movement.

After the fury of the first theme there is a hush like that before the renewed outburst of a tempest. I sat in strained expectancy waiting a yet more thunderous enunciation of the theme, but instead—the 'cello played notes of utter peacefulness and the storm seemed to have passed. Then like one instrument playing in broken chords, 'cello and piano swept in crescendo up the octaves into the first theme. Soon there was another calm, and tenderly the piano played alone as if for a moment (as in the second theme of the "knock" movement of Beethoven's Fifth) the composers were communing with God. The first theme was announced once more by piano, then 'cello, and th emovement ended.

In the Scherzo Movement the lilting notes of the 'cello made me thing of a sea-song sung by bold vikings as they sailed homewards up a long fiord. And the song seemed to echo back from cliff to cliff and soar aloft to the clouds which passed across the sky. Then after a long transition (I think that is what they call it), I heard a minor theme full of sadness. In the chords of the piano arose the harsh cries of the gulls, in the 'cello's notes the moan of fishwives when the fleet did not come home. But a lively dance tune dispells this gloom and the movement ends happily.

An elegy was played as an encore. Again and again the piano sounded monotonous chords until there flowed in the sad but not despairing tones of the 'cello. Soon I heard notes which seemed to represent the struggling soul of the bereaved in struggle, striving to quell its grief. Then the mournful theme with more depth, more yearning, gradually subsided and finally died away.

BASKETBALLERS DIVIDE WEEK-END BILL

Tricolor Seniors Beat Western Basketeers

London, Ont, Feb. 13th—Faced with opposition which ran them off their feet, outplayed, outscored and outlucked the Senior basketball team dropped a 24 to 17 decision to the Queen's University five at the Tecnical School on Friday night. The victory puts Western well at the bottom of the league, with only a slim mathematical possibility of figuring in the championship. By winning the remaining four games, the Mustangs can enter into a tie with McGill for first position. Saturday's games for the Mustangs started off well but their attack and defence weakened as time went on and the Tricolor squad had little trouble holding them at bay. Western opened the scoring in the early moments of the game, when Hogan tipped the rebound from Whitwell's foul shot into the basket. Queen's put on some pressure and stormed the Western citadel with shot after shot but luck was against them. Finally Newman found the range and aided by McMahon, built up a lead which the Mustangs never quite erased. The half time score stood at 15-10 for the Kingston team. Second half—Western rallyed for a time in the second half and it seemed for a while as if the Queen's men had tired and that superior condition would contribut to a Purple victory, but such was not the case, the Tricolor speeding up, just as it seemed inevitable that Alex Munroe's men would overtake them. Whitwell, Hogan and Munroe fought like trojans but to no avail and the gun went with Queen's ahead 24 to 17.

Newman was high man for the visitors as well as being top scorer of the game. For Western Whitwell, Hogan and Hayter turned in good performances.

Line-up:

Queen's — Centre, Brown (4); Forwards, McMahon (5) and Rooke (1); Guards, McLaughlin (2), Bews (3). Subs, Carter (3), Newman (6), and Hallet.

Western—Centre, Hogan (3); Forwards, Munroe (2) and Whitwell (5); Guards, Gunn (3), Cherniak. Subs, Hayter (4), Clarke and Zavitz.

SANTA BARBARA COLLEGE—Coeds, who far outnumber the reds, no longer worry about not having a date for the evening, as the men have organized an "American Inter-collegiate Association of Gigolos."

Tricolor Outscored By Varsity Cagemen

Queen's tried valiently to pull out of Toronto with a win on Friday evening, but were downed by their ancient rivals, Varsity, by four points, the final score being 26 to 22.

It was a dog fight from the opening whistle, and provided the spectators with rather humdrum basketball because of the close checking and cautious playing.

Varsity with the memory of an unexpected defeat at the hands of Queen's which put a serious crimp in their championship aspirations, were eager on revenge and with a partizan crowd bellowing encouragement, they oozed out in front.

Queen's elected to play the same style of game as they staged against Varsity here and it worked very well. There were times when a more open style might have got better results, but as Varsity were playing rannily Queen's followed suit.

Sniderman, the big Varsity guard was the hero of the evening from a Toronto angle, as he made three desperate sorties through the Tricolor ranks, at opportune times and scored a basket on each trip. These proved to be the choice plays of the game for it undoubtedly saved the Blues from a licking.

For Queen's Harry McLaughlin was on the basket in earnest looping in a total of ten points, and topping both teams in this respect. Had the forwards been able to pop them half as well the Queen's score would have been greater.

As predicted, Newman showed the Toronto fans plenty with his plain and fancy jumping at centre. He made the Toronto leaper, Caplan, look very ordinary, but his mates could not use the passes.

Rooke turned in a very peppy game, getting himself five good husky points by well-earned efforts. He started on the front line with Hallett. Bews was kept off the score sheet, but tried hard and did some nice work defensively.

Queen: Forwards, Hallett (2), Rooke (5); centre, Newman (3); guards, Bews (0), McLaughlin (10); subs., McMahon (2), Carter, Brown.

Varsity: Forwards, Allison (5); Collins (2); centre, Caplan (0); guards, Wood (5), Sniderman (9); subs., Gold (5); Wagman (0).

Referee: Percy Miller.

Premier Mussolini has requested Joe Savoldi, former Notre Dame grid star, to bring two football teams to Italy next spring in an attempt to popularize the game there.

SPORTS SLANTS

The Senior basketeers broke even on their two game tour. A win over Varsity would have been sweet, but they showed that they are the second best team in the loop.

* * * * * *

The Junior hockey team took things easy in their exhibition game at Brockville on Friday evening, dividing points with the natives, the score being 4 all. This game should put pep into them for the big series with Belleville.

* * * * * *

By the way, regardless of the result of Monday's first game, a goodly representation of Queen's fans at the second game in Belleville on Wednesday evening would help. It may be the last opportunity to travel with a Queen's team to furrin parts for some. And you can usually have plenty of fun with the natives in Belleville.

* * * * * *

Varsity must be poison to Don Bews. On Friday he failed to score a point, and that is something mighly unusual in his senior career. He came to with a bang at Western and caught the optics of the sport writers there.

* * * * * *

The Junior and Intermediate basketball squads will not see action until Friday of this week, when they both meet Napanee teams. And the Seniors meet Western.

* * * * * *

The B. W. & F. teams are keeping the old eye on the calendar. Friday and Saturday of this week sees them in action at Montreal in the Intercollegiate Assault.

Sports Views

By the tme this article appears in print, the Junior Hockey team will have played the first game of its series with Belleville for the right to go farther along the road. The winning by Belleville of its group was the signal for an immediate playoff arrangement that brought our neighbors to the Jock Harty Arena for the first game last night and the two teams will meet in Belleville tomorrow night for the second game.

While little is known regarding the merits of Belleville the concensus of opinion is that they will extend the Tricolor to the limit. However Coach Elmer and the boys are all set for them and believe they can take the series.

Toronto accounts of the Queen's-Varsity basketball game would almost lead one to believe that Varsity was playing itself, so little was said about Queen's players. In fact the game was not given so much space for an intercollegiate affair, and one enterprising morning paper from Toronto did not even have the score printed, let alone an account of the game. However, Queen's were every bit as good and only the lanky arms of Sniderman with three well timed, but very fortunate baskets, turned them back.

With Western as the opposition on Saturday evening the Tricolor swung into their stride and defeated the Mustangs by a score of 24 to 17. They led the Western team to the wire at half time and generally outplayed the London boys handily. The Western account of the game is printed on this page and reveals the Queen's margin. As Western almost defeated Varsity in the latter's own town, we can assume the Blues were somewhat fortunate in taking Queen's.

As a result of the games played in the Senior Intercollegiate basketball loop so far, McGill certainly looks to have the edge over the remaining teams. While it is possible for McGill to lose two games, none of the other teams seem to have the necessary class to do it. Queen's gave them their hardest tussle and may take them in Montreal, but they will be hard to down.

he commended to the attention of his audience. At this point the speaker digressed to consider some of the difficulties confronting politicians today. He emphasized that more and more governments are finding it necessary to consider the economic side of things and have to call in experts to their aid. "But as experts often disagree in opinion," Mr. Burrell observed, "they should be kept on tap, not on top."

In a closing word Mr. Burrell alluded to the companionship afforded by literature. "The true book lover," he remarked, "need never be lonely."

Peppy Water Polo Game Terminates Swimming Meet

performers were Pesner, who did practically all the scoring, and Butler, who performed marvels in the nets. It was nothing less than astounding to watch his work at times. On many occasions he made stops that were packed and labelled for goals. Whiteford also worked hard, but a cramp forced him to leave the game in the fourth quarter. The splendid work of Walter Perry was also terminated in the third quarter by an unfortunate accident—a misdirected blow fracturing his nose.

For Varsity Bancroft was the outstanding performer, but the entire squad played well.

The Queen's second team had little difficulty in downing the Kingston All-Star aggregation, the final score being 6-1.

The 100 yards race was carried off by Kelly of the Kingston club, with Watt and Stevenson of Queen's taking second and third places respectively. The time for the event was 16 2/5 seconds.

Lowe of Queen's ran away with the honors in the 50 yard contest. Almgvist of Queen's won the 200 yard breast stroke swim, with O'Connor, Queen's, coming second.

Some Impressions Of The Big Broadcast

It was a poor night for broadcasting but the local reception of CFRC wasn't too rusty . . . the announcers were good, especially Les Williams . . . a written script would have helped them a lot . . . Professor Morgan kept saying Kingston, Ontario, Canada . . . why not drop the "Canada"? . . . listeners within the radius of the station's broadcasting power know where Ontario is . . . everyone who mentioned the orchestra leader's surname pronounced it with the accent on the last syllable . . . with the notable exception of Billy Bissett himself, who pronounced it with the accent on the first syllable . . . couldn't the boys have asked him for the correct pronunciation? . . . the crowd was certainly making lots of noise . . . the "mike" made it sound like a mob at a prize-fight . . . 'somebody yelled "Hi Hank! . . . wonder who Hank is? . . .' Billy Bissett singing his theme song at 12 o'clock and bidding "au revoir" to the audience . . . the station kept the program on twenty minutes longer . . . it was a short "au revoir" . . . wonder how the "Kingston Crouch" fared while the orchestra was cutting loose with "Nobody's Sweetheart", "Dinah" and "Tiger Rag" . . . I bet there were a lot of backs sprained . . . did the trap-drummer put his feet through the drums during "Tiger Rag" or did he trip over them . . . it sounded great . . . "Oil thigh —" went over big with the audience . . . the old song sounded good on the air . . . the Queen's and Engineers' Yells were cut off in midgasp through a misadventure at the controls . . . the Levana "Yell" a la falsetto made a big hit . . . Sid Parkes speaking "— and the Engineering students have a wild, —er—wide reputation etc." . . . certainly hope that this broadcasting of formals becomes an established custom . . . other colleges are doing it . . . so should we . . . Congratulations for an hour and twenty minutes entertainment.

Western Grad Now Doing Research Work At Queen's

At Queen's University, Dr. K. Thompson, a former Londoner, is doing important research work in physics. Dr. K. Thompson is a graduate of Western University, and after studying at Ann Arbor, Chicago and Toronto, is carrying on this work at Queen's. Observation of the spectrum of gases, and their atomic structure and behaviour, is engaging his attention at present. He is particularly interested in the collision of atoms, and his experiments will have great influence in the field of Chemistry. Studying catalytic agents, those substances either elements or compounds, which change a chemical reaction without affecting any change in themselves, is the principle of his important experimenting.

How To Avoid Harmful Thoughts Sermon Topic

let him enter in. Secondly change your leisure occupation for in doing so you will change your thoughts. Change therefore the image of your thoughts. For when the image is in conflict with the will, the image will win. Said Jeremy Taylor, 'If thou beest assaulted with an unclean spirit trust not thyself, but run forth into the society of those, whose company may divert thy mind.' Practice an auto suggestion which will prepare you for the temptation when it comes. Jesus did that. Fill your minds full of convictions and emotions born of faith. Fourth, crowd the evil out by creating a new picture. Don't give way to the realists who imagine that life is an unclean scuffle in a drain. The trouble with these people is they don't face all the facts. It was a feeling that there was a grandeur in life which possessed the mind of a magistrate who has practised for thirty years in London. Hold off from thoughts of sensuality, for if you give youself up to them you will think of nothing else."

"Accept the good, that is the way to defeet evil. Take the wide view; enjoy music, books, everything that is fine. Watch that your conversation does not turn to meanness. Do not be like the woman who said she knew a person well enough to talk about her. I would sooner accept a deaf man's comments on a symphony as some men's estimates of character."

"When alone, do not hug the dark. Augustine said of the growth of an evil thought these four words: a thought, a picture, a fascination, a fall. Therefore keep only the picture of the good. The devil can best be defeated by a flank attack."

"There is tremendous potency in emotion. Share it in company with some beautiful soul. Plato indeed longed for the companionship of moral law incarnate. But we need not long, for there Jesus comes in. With Him you may say with Livingstone as he struggled through the jungles, 'Jesus the very thought of thee, with sweetness fills my soul'."

"When you pray remember the true attitude of prayer which is not to ask God to listen to you but which is for you to listen to God. Say, "Speak Lord for thy servant heareth", and "Cause me to hear thy loving kindness in the morning." The trouble with us is that we so very seldom listen. It is only by listening to God that we shall realize our sins and obtain forgiveness. Jacob did not absolve the guilt of his crime against Esau until he met the angel. Let us then like Jacob wrestle with the angel till we regain our peace of soul."

"When in conflict with evil thoughts say to God, 'It is not Thy will that these things come to me. Let it be Thy thoughts which come to me. Let them come alone, not afraid.' So may Christ in his infinite mercy lead us to a new place where we may hear the celestial harmonies of God's world. May we escape the seduction of harmful thoughts and pour forth our liberated lives in service for others."

UNIVERSITY OF MISSOURI—As a result of a bet, a student wore a sadly wrinkled crepe de chine dress for two days. He admitted having slept in it saying that it took a slide rule to figure how to get into it.

Letter From China Reveals Situation

Wars always seem rather unimportant when they are far away. Perhaps a little Chinese civil war would seem more like a real catastrophe if we could see it from the inside, as did Dr. Revelle, the writer whom we quote below.

Luchow, Szechuen,
November, 1932

Dear Friends:

It is too late to send you Christmas greetings now, but when I tell you what has been going on here for the past three weeks, you will understand. Luchow, known as the cock-pit of Szechuen, has been having a bit of civil war, and one of the minor inconveniences, was a hold-up of the mail. A local truce was signed Saturday night, and the Chungking army took peaceful occupation of the city today noon.

"Szechuen has half-adozen warlords, but the biggest ones are Liu Wen Huei, of Chengtu, the Capital, and Liu Hsiang, of Chungking. This Fall Liu Hsiang felt strong enough to drive out Liu Wen Huei, and Luchow was the first city to put up a sign of resistance against his march up river. Liu Hsiang has been building up a small air force the past two years, and on October 28th we had our first air raid. What a dastardly affair! Without a word of warning, on a totally unprotected city, as "our side" has no planes, on people most of whom had never seen a plane before, and with the war still a week from the city! I saw with my own eyes eleven of the dead. Three were women, only two were soldiers. What can these people say against Japan? At least, she doesn't stand accused of murdering her own flesh and blood. The siege of the city began a week later, and lasted fifteen days. We were practically surrounded, with bombardments coming across both rivers, which almost encircle the city. The aeroplanes came nearly every day and dropped bombs. We sometimes watched the black objects sailing to the ground, as we wondered what soul was soon to be hurtled into eternity. The people were thrown into a panic by the first air-raid, and many left the city, but they learned to fear more a sort of bomb thrown by a high-powered trench mortar from across both rivers, both day and night. A brother of my former teacher lost his life from a bomb that hit the roof of our church. The same dawn a piece of a bomb tore away the nose and part of the cheek of an aged man as he lay sleeping in a house across the road. One morning two young brothers, hit by the same shell, were carried into the hospital. The one died immediately, with a huge piece of metal just coming through his chest. The other, with brains oozing from a hole in his head, died that night. Another wee girl came in with her large intestine hanging out of a hole in her abdomen. Our Mission property skirts the wall opposite the small river, and we got more than our share of these bombs. At least seventeen hit our buildings. Last Saturday, four hit the hospital, one of them killing a seven-year-old girl refugee. Two of them hit within a few feet of the 25-foot Red Cross we had spread on the roof against air-raids. I came home for lunch last Saturday to find two sections of my verandah a heap of wreckage on the ground, and my rooms a welter of broken glass, dust, plaster, bits of brick and unburned sulphur. One of these bombs had come in the window upstairs, and its long steel tail-piece came to rest on my bedroom floor. Nothing was harmed inside, not even my "boy" who was in there cleaning up. An officer and two soldiers of the "enemy" butted into our compound this afternoon looking for billets. "Look at that mess", I said. "Nice looking, isn't it?"

The Chinese houses, most of them but one storey with a loft, and made of plaster-cast, were little protection against these missiles, so our foreign buildings, which are of brick, and from two to four storeys high, rendered the people a great service. No building was packed tighter with refugees than our hospital. They brought their bedding, and their meals, and slept in the rooms and corridors at night, even down in the dirty dog-run underneath, crawling in through the ventilators. Hucksters followed the crowd, till it was like a midway day in and day out. Of course, patients increased enormously. There were over fifty in-patients this morning, not to mention the wounded that lay in the waiting room and corridors, and had dressings done only. This afternoon we took off a foot, another afternoon two legs, another day a hand in the forenoon and a leg in the afternoon. Too much surgery for one who isn't interested in the subject."

—I. E. REVELLE.

FOOLING THE PROF.

An English professor at Cornell informed his class that he had discovered an essay which had been copied word for word from the preface of a texthook not used by that class. With utmost severity, he ordered the offender to see him after class, adding that he would omit the mention of his name in the classroom if the student would present himself after class. After the dismissal he found himself face to face with five individuals.

Engineering Society No Longer Dispenses Free Ink

Toronto, Ont. — Gone are the days of lavish and profligate waste, economy must rule. At least the Engineering Society has adopted this motto, and no longer may embryo engineers slake their thirsty fountain pens in the common filling station for a smile and a "Thank you." Ink has now become a cut and nearly dried "penny in the slot" proposition—we supply it, you use it, and the difference is a cent a shot.

For some time the Engineering Society Supply Room has been supplying fills for fountain pens gratis, with the result that about ten and a half gallons of ink has been passed out to every ten cent bottle sold, making a net loss of about 10,000 per cent. But these days are past and over, and ink has now become one of the leading commodities of the institution. Starting with a charge of two cent and promptly reducing the price fifty per cent, because of the tremendous outcry, the Society now offers you as much as your pen can hold of either of two popular brands of writing fluid for the modest sum of one cent. A free windshield wipe and change of oil goes with each order.

Students are carefully searching their economy books for a free ticket for this popular store, but have failed to find one. Apparently the Society feels that the quality of the ink sells itself, and advertising is unnecessary.

Already the weight of the penny just below the slot is assuming tremendous proportions and it is expected to be sufficient, in the near future to purchase a mechanical 'Robot' who will fill your pen, wipe it, change the oil (if any) and smile a courteous "thank you" into the bargain.

Keene Girls Prove Keen, Defeat Co-Eds

In an exciting game Saturday night, Keene Girls' Hockey team took a 1-0 victory from Levana. Their single goal was captured in the first period, but, though aggressive throughout the game, they tried in vain to increase the score. In the matters of passing and stick-handling, the visitors had a slight edge over the Levana team, but in other respects the teams were well matched. Queen's girls certainly looked much improved, and with a little more self-confidence and encouragement should develop into a snappy aggregation. Marjorie Brown was the star for Keene, and Jean Nelson for Queen's. Queen's were fortunate in securing an experienced O.H.A. referee, Bill Watts, for their game with Keene.

Line-up:

Keene — Goal, Lois McCarthy; wings, Helen Nelson, Dot Gainor; defence, Kathleen Nelson, K. McCarthy; centre, Marjorie Brown; subs., Roberta Gainor; Edith Nelson, Mary McCarthy.

Queen's—Goal, Margaret McGregor; wings, Jean Cameron, Jean Stewart; defence, Lillian Ward, Jean Nelson, Mary Chambers; subs., Aileen Mason, Ruby Cordy, Carmel Milne.

Referee: Bill Watts.

Campus and Gym

Levana '35 won the inter-year championship at the co-eds' swimming meet staged in the Queen's gymnasium recently with a total of 34 points. The freshettes took second place with 20 points and the seniors third with eleven, the juniors bringing up the rear with eight points. In addition to the inter-year competitions a diving exhibition was presented by the Queen's team and a life-saving exhibition by three co-eds.

Three novelty races added to the evening's entertainment, Jo Tett managed to collect 28 corks to win the fifty yard cork race amid a storm of applause. The triple race in which pairs of co-eds tied together swam the length of the tank was won by two freshettes. Another race which attracted attention was where the coeds plunged into the tank fully dressed, disrobed in the water and then swam 25 yards. Marion Hayes romped home in front in this race.

Scientists Disproved Theory Of Generation

Miss M. Baker was the speaker at the last meeting of the Natural History Club. Her subject was "Spontaneous Generation." The credence of mankind to this theory dates from a very early time.

We find mention of spontaneous generation of living animals in Aristotle; and in the "Georgics", written abont 30 B.C., we find a description of how to generate "spontaneously" flies from the carcass of a young bullock, by exposing it in a room with four windows facing the four winds. People were a long time tumbling to the realization that flies so produced were not generated spontaneously; but finally Redi showed that when he put small pieces of meat in two jars, and after sealing one jar, exposed them out-of-doors flies appeared in the unsealed jar, but not in the sealed one. Later a similar experiment was carried out by Hook, the lens-maker. He had invented a microscope that was powerful enough to reveal micro-organisms in hay-infusions. After exposure to air, decay set in always, due to the contamination from the air of the meat by the organisms producing decay.

At the next meeting of the Club Mr. Harrison F. Lewis will be the guest speaker. Mr. Lewis is chief migratory bird officer for Ontario and Quebec. He is the author of several works on birds; particularly "The Starling in Ontario" and "The Double Crested Coromant." His afternoon lecture will be on some scientific subject that should be both interesting and instructive. A more popular lecture will be given in the evening. This will be on the sanctuaries of the St. Lawrence and will be illustrated by motion pictures and slides. Members of the Frontenac Fish and Game Protective Association and the Kingston Horticultural Society have been asked to attend the evening meeting. Members of the club will note that 4 o'clock on Thursday, Feb. 16th, 1933, is the date of the first meeting.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY — There are 58 horses attending school to test the real equality of "horse sense." For their first lesson the creatures are required to open the cover on a feed box. The fastest horses opened the cover in five seconds.

Scandinavian Songs Featured At Recital

The Ban Righ Musicale, held last Sunday, owed much of its charm to the admixture of northern music. Of the three songs with which Mr. Percival opened the program, two were by Scandinavian composers, in sharp contrast to the gentle "Where'er you Walk." The second of these, by far the most brilliant, had an Erlkonig-like realism in its picture of love riding over the earth on his winged steed Pegasus.

Next Miss Knight played an Etude and Waltz (by Chopin) with all the skill she has led us to expect of her, and then a Handel Sonata was played by Mr. Wenger. As Dr. Gibson pointed out, this sonata, composed before the piano style had been fully developed, was accompanied only by a "figured bass"; but the second and third movements definitely belied the statement that the piano part was uninteresting, while the suspicion that it might seem too long proved likewise unfounded.

Folk-music always seems to have a special appeal, which was shared both by Mrs. Wiatt's songs (the well-known Linden Lea and the lovely Soft Day) and by Mr. Wenger's energetic Ukrainian Dance. Moreover, Svendsen's Romance, (also played by Mr. Wenger) owes its popularity to the echoes of native Norwegian airs, without which it would be lost amidst the work of the great European masters.

Finally, Miss Knight appeared again to play a Concert Study by Liszt and a Romance by Sibelius, thus concluding a program notable both for contrasts and individual merit.

Mrs. W. H. Fyfe To Speak On Rembrandt, To-day

Mrs. W. H. Fyfe will speak on Rembrandt to the members of the Kingston Art Association this afternoon at the Douglas Library, Room 111. Fifty framed reproductions of works by Rembrandt have been secured on loan from the Art Gallery of Toronto and will be on exhibition from fourthirty. The lecture, which will be illustrated by lantern slides loaned by the same gallery, will begin promptly at five o'clock. This is the fifth in the series of talks arranged for this winter by the Executive of the Association.

Several talks remain to be given.

Membership is still open for the nominal dues of fifty cents.

Bach Operetta Producers Making Steady Progress

The Bach Operetta to be presented in Grant Hall on March 7th is shaping up nicely under the direction of Mrs. H. L. Tracy.

A full rehearsal will be held Wednesday afternoon at five in Ban Righ Hall.

The Operetta will be accompanied by an orchestra which is practising every week conducted by Prof. Tracy. And it is understood that Miss Murphy is training a group of dancers who will participate in the production.

GRADS CLUB MEETING

There will he a meeting of the Grads Club at 8 P.M. Thursday, February 16, in the Science Club Room. The speaker will be Prof. F. A. Knox of the Economic Department.

Club Presented French-Canadian Music and Songs

J. J. Fortin Narrated Interesting Story Of Chansons And Music

The French Club put on an excellent program of French songs and music which delighted a large audience last Wednesday afternoon. Every moment from the opening song of "O Canada" to "God Save the King" was full of interest and the variety of the program ranging from song to piano to violin solos provided something to suit everyone's taste.

To those who understand French, Mr. J. J. Fortin's short appreciation of the history of the French-Canadian Chansons spoken in a slow distinct tone was of great interest as it gave an insight into their origin and a reason for their popularity. Many of the folk-songs it seems date back to the 11th and 12th centuries when they were sung from mouth to mouth, telling of the primary impulses of man, his joys and sorrows, his loves and ambitions. Naturally when French settlers came to Canada they brought with them their favorite songs which they had preserved in their memories. In their new life they had had to fish and trap, cut timber and hunt and gradually they adapted the songs of the French Court and wars to fit the rhythmic beat of the paddle and the pad pad of the snowshoes. These songs became a necessary part of the life of the trapper and lumberman, the farmer and canoeman and with the coureur-de-bois and other explorers they were carried to every part of the country. Now these catchy tunes are hummed wherever there are settlements of French-Canadians from Gaspé to the Rockies.

Six numbers constituted the program, the first and last of which were chansons. The first

DR. ERNEST THOMAS

Who will be the principal speaker at the S.C.M. Conference to be held here over the week-end.

Dr. E. Thomas, D.D. To Speak At Queen's

Dr. Thomas Leader Elgin House Groups

Dr. Ernest Thomas, who comes here this week-end under the auspices of the S.C.M. has had a long and intimate connection with Queen's. His first associations with the University were formed in the closing years of the last century with the Theological Alumni Association. To Dr. Watson, and this Association he acknowledges a debt of gratitude. From the pastorate of the Methodist Church he went to the position of secretary on the board of Social and Moral Reform. Since 1925 he has been secretary of the Board of Evangelism and Social Service. He has a wide knowledge of social subjects, and has written booklets which have had wide circulation among students. Dr. Thomas is known to undergraduates and graduates across Canada as a leader of Elgin House groups. He has not lost contact with the student mind and his insight into the movements of our own day, his sanity in estimating them and his vivid presentation have made him a wise leader who is much in demand.

On Saturday night in the Theological Hall, Dr. Thomas will lead discussion on the topic, "Christian Marriage and Before."

John Masefield's Quiet Sense Of Humour And Inexpressible Charm Won Hearts Of Large Audience

Listeners Captivated As Poet Read Poems Selected From Works

To hear John Masefield was a privilege never to be forgotten, not only because he is the British Poet Laureate, and because his stories were unusual and clever, and his poetry unsurpassed in its beauty, but simply because he is John Masefield, whose quiet sense of humour and inexpressible charm completely won the hearts of his audience. There were no remarks or comments given on his writings, which were read with that modesty characteristic of only the truly great. Masefield possesses, moreover, a resonant and beautifully modulated voice which lent to his poetry a music that the finest verse can never attain unless it is read aloud.

The selections chosen by Masefield were representative of all his best work. Perhaps the favourite with the audience was "Reynard the Fox", with its vivid pictures of the English countryside, and its thrilling description of the chase. The sympathy awakened for the hunted animal is almost overpowering in its intensity. One wanted to jump up and say to Masefield "Don't let the fox be killed, I can't bear it!"

"Cap on Head, A Tale of the O'Neill" is a fantastic ballad, whose mysticism only those of Celtic blood can quite understand. The legend was told to Masefield by an old Irishman who believed it as implicitly as if it had happened only yesterday.

From Salt Water Ballads, Masefield read the well-known "Sea Fever" with its haunting melody, and its call of the sea.

"The Riders At the Gate" is an unusual poem, telling of Pompey's ghost warning Caesar of his approaching death, for "The house is falling,

The beaten men come into their own."

Dr. F. Lloyd To Give Next Extension Lecture

"A Naturalist's Glimpses of Africa" is the title of the next Extension Lecture which will be given by Dr. F. E. Lloyd, B.A., Ph.D., F.R.S., next Monday afternoon at five o'clock in Convocation Hall.

Dr. Lloyd was born in Manchester, England, 1868, and received his early education at Liverpool Institute. He later attended Layfeyette College, finishing his education at Princeton University.

Dr. Lloyd has become a leading authority in his field and his time is divided between investigation, teaching and writing. He served on the Columbia University Expedition to Puget Sound and Alaska. Other expeditions were to Mexico and Dominica.

Williams College claimed him as an instructor, but his services were in demand and he did not say there. He was later connected with Arizona Agriculture Experimental Station, and the New York Botanical Gardens.

Dr. Lloyd is the author of several valuable works in his field. "Plant World" is among his most noted writings.

Poetry Has Lost Old Popularity Because Poets Do Not Seek Large Audiences

John Masefield Suggests Means Of Making Poetry More Popular In Interview Yesterday

By E. H. Lill

"Poetry is relatively unpopular as compared with prose composition because of late, very few poets have tried to reach large audiences", said John Masefield, British Poet Laureate in an interview granted to the Journal yesterday morning, at the home of Dr. G. H. Clarke, head of the English Department at Queen's. "Formerly poets reached their audiences by speaking to them or by having their work performed in the theatre. But for a long time now poetry has been banished from the theatre. If poets tried to appeal directly to their audiences poetry could be made popular. As it is most poets seem to have neither the power nor the desire to do it. Many of them are more interested in the presentation of subtle thoughts and ideas."

"Several years ago", continued Mr. Masefield, "I advocated employing several young poets to broadcast their poetry over the radio and experiment with forms of verse and drama which would have a wider popular appeal. Although this suggestion was not adopted I think that the radio offers a great opportunity to poets who wish to increase the popularity of poetry".

"What, in your opinion is the relation between poetry and life?" he was asked.

"At present", said Mr. Masefield, "there is little relation because poets have been too remote from their audiences. I think, however, that this will be remedied slowly. There is a tendency among poets of to-day to appeal to larger audiences. The radio will help them materially in this endeavour."

Mr. Masefield stated that there is no truth in the rumour that he will publish a book in the near future.

"One of your books is entitled Odtaa. What does this mean, Mr. Masefield?" was the next query.

"One Darn Thing After Another," replied the Poet Laureate. "An American said that it was just like life so I called it Odtaa."

"What do you consider the best training for writing," Mr. Masefield was asked.

Mr. Masefield pansed for a moment before replying. "You

Negative Side Wins Phil Class Debate

Opposing the resolution that every event is determined, John Parker and Jock Kent were awarded the decision of the house in a recent debate before the Philosophy 1. class, against Roy Sharpe and Ray Brunton.

Mr. Sharpe, the leader of the Affirmative maintained that since logic is the basis of science and that as philsophy is a science the element of chance must be replaced by determinism in the modern world. The scientist is interested in explaining the relationships of the world, and that to deny the fundamentals of philosophy is to deny our own being.

Mr. Parker, speaking for the Negative asserted that the new physics is the negation of determinism and that causation in the physical

J. S. MacLean Commerce Club Guest Speaker

Committee Obtains Eminent Executive To Speak At Dinner

Hoping to continue the success of the Annual Dinners of the Commerce Club of previous years, the executive has secured as the guest speaker for this function Mr. James Stanley McLean who has been recommended as one of Canada's leading business men.

More than 150 students, professors and business men from Kingston and district attended the banquet sponsored by last year's Commerce Club, when the Hon. H. H. Stevens was the principal speaker. Next Thursday the Commerce Club has the pleasure to present a Toronto business man whose varied experience and reputation as an able speaker promises a most interesting address.

Mr. McLean was born in Durham County, Ontario, on May 1st, 1876, a son of Colonel William and Sarah (Jennings) McLean of Port Hope, Ontario. After attending the Public School and High School at Port Hope, Mr. McLean entered the University of Toronto graduating with a B.A. in 1896. The art of school teaching attracted Mr. McLean but after a period of two years he left this profession to become a clerk with the Harris Abattoir Co. Four years later Mr. McLean had risen to the position of Secretary-Treasurer. Upon the re-organization of the company in 1927 he was elected Vice-President and also President of Canada Packers Limited. At the present he holds also the Presidency of Gunn, Ltd., another large packing company. Thus Mr. McLean as the representative head of these large packing concerns virtually controls the packing industry in Eastern Canada.

Mr. McLean's interests extend beyond the business world and his Clubs include the National, Lambton and Carlton. At present he is interested in the Massey Music Hall serving as Chairman of the Board of Trustees of that Organization.

The Commerce Club feels confident that it is presenting a man of outstanding ability and they ask for the interested support of every Commerce student to help make this one of the finest dinners of the year.

Besides the guest speaker an interesting program is being arranged. Dinner will be served at 7.15 sharp. Tickets may be obtained for $1.50 from any member of the executive.

The names of the executive are given below:

W. D. Muir, D. Wade, C. O'Neill, S. Stanyar, H. Clarkson, S. Whiteford, E. Hughes.

The date of the dinner is Thursday, February 23rd, but members would aid the committee by purchasing their tickets early.

A Capacity Audience

Seldom since its erection has the K.C.I. Auditorium been jammed to capacity as it was on the occasion of John Masefield's lecture recital last Wednesday evening. So great was the crowd which had gathered to hear the English Poet Laureate and pay their respects to him for coming to Kingston that many had to stand during the program.

Mr. Masefield has been met with an enthusiastic reception everywhere he has appeared on this, his first visit to America for the purpose of appearing on the public platform. It was hoped that Kingston and Queen's would accord him a reception as enthusiastic as he had received elsewhere. It is gratifying indeed to learn that a large percentage of the audience was composed of students.

The capacity audience was amply repaid for its interest by Mr. Masefield's excellent program. He did not take long to gain the complete sympathy and interest of his listeners for with his first story he drew rounds of well deserved applause. The suspense which was ever present as he skimmed through the pages of his poetical writings or as he recounted tales so characteristic of the sea is ample proof that his listeners were enthralled both by the power of his writings and the charm of his personality.

If we were to single any one of his works which seemed to be most popular with the audience we would have no hesitation in naming "Reynard the Fox" for this distinction.

Mr Masefield ended his recital by sounding a note of faith and hope in the world. This world, he said, is but the shadow of the greater existence of which we may have glimpses in our moments of exaltation. His message of hope is indeed a comforting one.

We are happy at this time to extend our felicitations to Dr. George Herbert Clarke for his untiring efforts in planning and bringing to a successful close the visit of the English Poet Laureate.

Real Heroes

Today the extra-curricular reading of the high school boy and girl consists for the most part of sexy stories screaming with feminine details. The passion for this type of literature becomes a part of the youthful student and he carries this trait into his college days. His hero becomes the dashing, young blade who passes as the best dressed young man at Bridge College, who shines on the dance floor, plays a corking hand of bridge, and is at his best on a chesterfield. He always "goes over big" with women, and invariably ends up by carrying the girl. The old man salts him away in some corner of the department store or ties him down to a desk in the office.

What a life," we exclaim. "What a hero!" Surprising as it may seem the majority of the young men and women are perfectly contented with a life like this. The young men keep on dressing up, getting gunned up, and carrying on as if the next dance were the most important thing; while the girls keep falling for the best dancer on the floor, for the card expert, and the chesterfield Romeo.

We may be different, but we have a yearning for the swashbucking hero and have little use for the characters that run through the pages of most of our contemporary literature. We fail to be interested in a hero who excells in a boudoir. The soda-fountain cowboy is out of favor with us.

How refreshing it is to turn to such real heroes as D'Artagnan, Captain Amyas Leigh, Quentin Durward, and even Baron Munchausen.

The Value of an Education

We often hear the questions asked, "What's the use of an education anyway? Can you get a better job as a result of it? Isn't it true that college graduates are a drag on the market, and that it is often a handicap rather than an advantage to be one when seeking a position?"

This point of view which is purely commercial is to be regretted as it ignores all the benefits of a college education which cannot be reckoned in terms of money. However, even taking this viewpoint, it is easily proved that the value of an education is considerable.

Dean E. W. Lord of the College of Business Administration, Boston University gives the following figures:

"The average elementary school trained boy goes to work at about 14 years of age. At thirty he reaches his maximum income of about $1,200 a year. Between the ages of fourteen and sixty he earns about $45,000. No more than $2,000 is earned during the four years that would have given him a high school education.

"The High-School graduate goes to work at eighteen, passes the average untrained man within seven years, rises steadily to his own maximum of $2,200 at forty, and continues at that level for the remainder of his active life. His total earnings from eighteen to sixty are about $78,000. The $33,000 difference between his lifetime earnings and those of the untrained man, represent the cash value of a high-school course.

"The college graduate begins work at twenty-two, and at twenty-eight is earning as much as the high-school graduate at forty. His total earnings from twenty-two to sixty amount to $150,000 or $72,000 more than those of the high-school graduate, a measure of the cash value of a college course.

"The conclusions which may be drawn from these facts that every hour spent in high school is worth at least $5.00 in after life, and every hour spent in college earns at least $10.00."

This should prove conclusively to all doubters that an education has a very real commercial value. We think, however, that this is the least of the benefits to be obtained from one.

The cultural benefits of a college education must not be lightly glossed over. If it does nothing else it teaches a man how to read and how to appreciate some of the finer things of life. We speak of an educated man as being well-read, and this is literally true. No one can spend four years in any reputable university without having read fairly widely on various subjects. Usually, when he is through college he continues reading books of real cultural benefit, for after four years he has got the habit of reading, and his mind is trained to appreciate somewhat better books than the man with only an ordinary education.

But this is not all. At college a man usually participates to a greater or lesser extent in a wide variety of activities. He sees some good shows, hears some good music, and attains a broader outlook on life. He makes friendships based on a community of interest, which are real and lasting. He attends some dances and some parties and learns how to handle himself in various situations. He probably does some debating and acquires enough self-confidence to be able to make a public speech without making a fool of himself. In short he is in every way a better all round man. Yes, we repeat, the monetary gains are the least of the benefits of a college education.

Honor System

During the recent flurry of final examinations, the question of employing the honor system frequently was raised in student circles. Under this plan, a student's honor would be the only safeguard against the practice of dishonesty in an examination.

Honor systems are being experimented with throughout the country. Some apparently are successful; others are being abandoned. Here at Indiana the honor system is not in general use, and it would be difficult to determine if students would be more honest on examination if it were in force here. Unscrupulous students, knowing the aversion of college teachers to assume the role of police, sometimes take advantage of this. An elaborate system of cribbing has been devised. Perhaps you were not too busy in the course of a test during final exams to have noted some of the following practices being followed by dullards about you:

A long narrow strip of paper with matches glued at both ends was rolled up from both ends and held in place by a rubber band. It could be manipulated easily in the palm of the hand and was very popular with the less scrupulous students, judging from its widespread use. Leaves torn from old blue books were filled with vital facts and placed in the blue book to copy from while taking the examination.

More meticulous students purchased yellow lead pencils and with hard lead inscribed information on the sides of the pencils. This, no doubt, was very baffling to assistants conducting the tests. Adhesive tape containing memorandums was pasted to the inside of the wrist and proved a boon to many who had little faith in their memory. This "crib" also seemed to work very nicely beneath mesh stockings.

One of the most original methods of cheating, perhaps, was that used by a young lady who made index cards of her course and placed them inside her purse. What professor would rebuke a perspiring coed for opening her purse frequently to nervously powder her nose during the turmoil of an exam? Another ingenious fellow made a complete circular crib movable around his leg above the knee. He then made a slit in one of the grooves of his corduroys and managed very nicely, thank you.

There were many other methods of cheating employed, some almost too daring to believe—all of which brings us to the question at hand: if such practices can be employed successfully in a room half-filled with students and half by watching professors and their assistants, would there be any failing students under an honor system?

Delinquent Students Must Pay Their Bills

University, Miss.—the University of Mississippi to-day taught its students the necessity of paying bills by barring 90 of them from classes until they had paid for meals they ate in the University hospital.

"If college students can't remember to comply with their financial obligations promptly, then it remains the duty of the University administration to teach it to them," Business Manager John L. Gainey said. "We do not think our method is severe."

The delinquent accounts range from 25 cents up. An English instructor also was included in the list of delinquents.

Material For "A Pair Of Silk Stockings" Sent

Material for "A Pair of Silk Hose" was the request recently received at the Package library of the University Extension division. However, the high school girl who wrote the letter was not sent a package of silk yarn and some knitting needles, for her request was for material to use in a project in a course in economics, and her article, entitled "A Pair of Silk Hose," was to include all the details of how silk stockings are made.

Data on this subject and a history of the development of the silk industry was mailed to her.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

February 14, 1933.

Editor of The Journal,

Dear Sir:

Your last issue contained an article under the title, "Man is always in the shadow of the Skirt," which supplied much food for thought. I am inclined to disagree, however, with several statements made in the debate, "Co-education is a Failure," and although I may "put my foot in it," I would like to venture a few personal opinions on this delicate subject.

The first speaker for the affirmative, Miss Smith, asserted that athletics for women are woefully neglected. Their gymnasium equipment is inadequate and the men are favored in every way." I fail to see where athletics for women are neglected; they use the same gymnasium equipment as the men, the same swimming pool, they have their hockey, basketball and tennis teams—what more do they want? Would they like to play football, to wrestle or box? (It might not be a bad plan, at that, to teach the gals an uppercut or a hook—they already know most of the holds.)

The first speaker for the negative, Miss Wilkins, said "Professors in general prefer to lecture to mixed classes. The suggestion that mixed classes put a restraint on students of both sexes is a fallacy." Miss Wilkins does not know her professors for they most decidedly do not prefer to lecture to mixed classes. A professor teaching a Science or Medicine class can make a fruity remark, or tell a spicy joke to illustrate a point, but this would be out of the question if he were lecturing to a mixed class, (although the women present might appreciate the joke even more than the man!).

The statement that mixed classes do not put a restraint on students is false.

In the presence of co-eds, men are self-conscious—they can't help it, they are only human. As for the woman, they are forever primping and fussing when the males are near. Besides the restraint in mixed classes, it is impossible for the men to concentrate on the problem at hand. Why? Because nothing is more distracting than a shapely leg thrust in one's line of vision; it is apt to throw the best of us off our bearings.

Another of Miss Wilkins' statements, "neither students, professors nor alumni have demanded a change," bears looking into. No one has asked for a change for the simple reason that it would be an impossibility to get one. How can anyone deny the inexorable demands of women? They were given the vote, they are allowed to get a higher education and God knows what they will want next!

Then another statement, "segregated men's colleges were founded on a fear of women—." Does the speaker mean to assert that universities like Oxford and Cambridge, to name but two outstanding examples, were founded on a fear of women. My dear lady, women were mere household chattels in the days when Oxford and Cambridge were founded—women hardly figured outside of their own little domestic circle and men did not fear women any more than the horse or cow, (Would that there were more like them today!)

And then we come to the introduction of the new Proto-Surrealist party (whatever the devil that may be). I'm afraid Messrs. Parker and Gilmour have been seeing motion pictures in which the Hollywood conception of college life is so alluringly painted. "Let us have co-operative boarding houses and co-educational residences where men and women live side by side, where they can learn to understand and know each other so that after graduation they may be more successful in the outside world." Brave words—if a trifle fantastic!

Can you picture the happy boys and girls in the line-up at the Union waiting for their meals? And what gay talk and banter we would hear across the table!

"My dear! You should see the stunning suit I got downtown today—and a wonderful bargain too! Only $20, with two pairs of panties—really it's a dream!" Whoops!

Or something like this.

"Oh Billy, did the naughty man hit you hard at the assault last night? Poor ickle feller, can you see with your eye? Let momma kiss it and make it all better," and so on, ad asylum.

And then after the evening meal, the couples would went their way to the nearest chesterfield, or bridge table, or the more daring might assay a game of billiards—what ripping fun, egad! And then comes the close of the weary day and Juliet goes off to her little bed happy with the knowledge that her great big Romeo is not far away. A touching thought!

What an enchanting prospect college would become—I don't think. If the plans of Messrs. Parker and Gilmour ever came to pass (Heaven forbid!), the marriage rate among college graduates would decline with appalling speed. After four years of looking at women across the breakfast table—in the morning when they look their worst—who would have the courage to face a lifetime of such sights. No gentlemen, I'm afraid your system is doomed to failure. What shrewd woman (they are all pretty canny) would risk her chance of marriage by letting a man see her under such unfavorable conditions? Very, very few.

And so I make a plea to all real men to hold forth against this insidious idea. Petticoat rule is all right for "pansies" who develop into hen-pecked husbands—but it will not be tolerated by he-men!

Thanking you for your valuable space, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

NELLES W. TIMMERMAN,

a "Square Meal" Friday noon, if there was such a thing left in this world of "Fruit Juice and Lettuce Salad". Peever, despite his cold, was asking Ewen about good places to dance in Montreal, (Dancing is the favorite indoor sport of these two gentlemen) if you don't believe the writer, ask anyone who was at Ottawa. Jimmy Campbell and Jimmy Peters were head to head exchanging views with the hope of learning the old trick from one another. Campbell thought he might pin his man's shoulders to the mat with a one-two punch and Peters was sure he could at least get a technical K.O. with a Cradle Hold. The rest of the team were holding an impromtu debate on "Technocracy", Carlyle leading the affirmative and Chuck Woolgar the negative. The discussion got so heated that Bud Gorman as an authority was called in to arbitrate and so on far into the night.

The Intercollegiate championship team of last year has been sadly wrecked by graduations, examinations, etc. There are only 3 veterans of last year's champions, J. Campbell, H. Hosking and M. Peever. Around this nucleus has been built a new team which will give a good account and make a good showing at Montreal over the week-end at the Intercollegiate Assault at Arms. There are no false prophesies being made about the outcome but, Queen's have a mighty good chance to bring home the bacon and if they don't it won't be lack of trying because every man is going down there to give the best he has.

The team which will represent Queen's at the Meet is as follows:

118 lb.—J. McGill
125 lb.—R. Mitchell
135 lb.—R. MacDonald

Festival Competition Starts Next Week

The Eastern Ontario Regional Competition of the Dominion Drama Festival will be held in Convocation Hall on February 23, 24 and 25. There will be four performances.

The price of seats will be 75 cents downstairs and in the first row of the balcony, 50 cents elsewhere. All seats will be reserved. Strips of tickets for the four performances are now on sale at the Post Office. Seats may be reserved in advance if these are bought by Saturday morning, February 18. After that date the plan will be in Grinham's bookshop on Princess Street. A strip of tickets for the 75 cent seats for the four performances costs $2.25. There is no reduction for the 50 cent seats.

During February and March similar competitions are being held all over Canada. Other Provinces, for the most part, have one competition each, but Ontario is divided for this purpose into three Regions, Eastern Ontario, Toronto, and Western Ontario. In the Eastern Ontario competition dramatic societies from Belleville, Brockville, Ottawa and Kingston are taking part. No full-length long plays are being given; all the entries are one-act plays or scenes from long plays. No entry must take less than 20 minutes or longer than 45 minutes to present.

The Adjudicator is Mr. Sterndale Bennett, an Englishman who has lived in Western Canada and is now in Toronto. He has been in touch with dramatic work for years, and has been chosen as Adjudicator by the Central Committee of the Dominion Festival in Ottawa. He will after each performance comment on the presentation of the plays during that performance. On his recommendation one or more of the plays will be recommended to the Central Committee for presentation in Ottawa in April at the Dominion Drama Festival, which His Excellency the Governor-General has inaugurated and for which he has offered a cup.

The Ottawa Drama League is presenting six plays. Members of the Ottawa Drama League are individually well-known to Queen's students. It is expected that Art Pettapiece will be among the players. The dramatic work of the League is well known, and it is an unusual opportunity for an audience in Kingston to have so many of its players here at one time.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY—Restrictions on women students have been lifted to the extent that they are to be permitted to visit the men students' rooms.

More than 200 articles were turned in at the lost and found department of the University of Minnesota last quarter, but only half of them were claimed.

ARTS '36 YEAR DANCE

Announcement has been made by Alex. Deans, president of the year, that the Arts '36 dance will take place Monday evening, February 27th, from 9 o'clock to 1 in Grant Hall. It has been arranged for "Bob" Warmington's orchestra to supply the music. Tickets will go on sale next Tuesday in the Arts Club room.

A large crowd is expected, largely because of the fact that many pleasing features have been planned, such as novelties, dim lights with a variety of coloured ones, and refreshments.

When questioned as to the possibility of a raid Mr. Deans stated, "Let them come. They'll be surprised at the "warm" reception we have planned for them."

THE CAMPUSCOPE

Olfactory Acuity

The advance of civilization has left man with only a vestige of what was probably a very efficient olfactory sense at one time. Nature inexorably penalizes the negligent creature by atrophy of the neglected organ. Dogs, which never overlook an opportunity to use their noses as a means of appraisal and criticism of such objects as they encounter, retain their scenting abilities in spite of many centuries of domestication. It is probable that the domestic cat also equals its brethren of the wilds in this respect. Indeed, when one considers how the common tabby can pick up extrinsic odours through a two-foot aura of fish-head halitosis, one realizes that her capabilities fall little short of the miraculous.

But our far ancestors developed other methods of seeking out and identifying prey and partners. They found that visual signs, interpreted by the powers of man's superior memory, offered more reliable and more lasting evidence than could be derived from the investigation of effluvia. And when men developed the faculty of verbal communication, and began to congregate in tribal villages, the better to exercise their newly acquired talents, they allowed their powers of odour analysis to atrophy still further, probably in self-defence.

Except as an extension of the range of gustatory sense, the ability to smell is of little advantage to modern men. It may be regarded as an avenue for aesthetic satisfaction, but so few tangible odours are of high aesthetic quality that the nose probably picks up more irritation than enjoyment.

Higher education is seldom kind to the olfactory sense. The bright youngster who first contracted "chemistry" to the less elegant, but more expressive form "stink" should not be forgotten when the national heroes are counted. We find that after a year of organic, students are no longer able to judge as to the condition of venison, and after a course in physiological chemistry they may crawl free-nostrilled through a pole-cat's lair.

But still our noses fill a place in our lives and consciousness, sometimes a very large place. We use them a great deal for instance to express some of our emotional feelings. We wrinkle our noses to express disgust, even when the object of our antipathy does not in any way offend the sense of smell. We sniff to express contempt or suspicion of someone without consciously intending to convey the idea that we expect the prurience of the villain's soul to be manifested as a physically malodorous condition. The snort is the action by which we eject an idea we refuse to entertain. Movie actresses invariably cry through their noses.

An odour may evoke vivid memories and associations from the past. In my mind the odour of sanctity must always be connected with the emanations of dusty pew-cushions and the redistilled essence of peppermint drops. Frequently an odour which we encounter brings up forcibly the recollection of a time of great emotional stress, although at the time of the recalled incident the smell was something of very minor importance and was apparently disregarded completely.

The bouquet of an old liqueur and the aroma of a good cigar are satisfaction's which man would not lightly relinquish, but when we consider the boiling of tripe and onions, it does seem that man could still enjoy life if he only saw the smoke.

London Cagers Start On Eastward Tour

London, Ont., Feb. 16 (C.I.P.)—Spurred on by the sting of two successive losses the Mustang cagers left to-day on their eastern trip to Kingston and Montreal, determined to bring back a victory. To-night in the new Queen's gymnasium, Alex Munroe's squad takes on the clever Tricolor team in what should prove to be a real struggle. Although beaten on their home floor last week, the Mustangs are out to show the Limestone City students that they are capable of playing a much better game than the one staged last Saturday.

While all credit is due to Queen's for their well-earned victory, after a long journey and the game of the previous night, the Mustangs were distinctly off color due to Hayter's infected foot and Munroe's lame wrist. These two court stars have provided most of the Purple's punch this year and much of the team's success depends on their efforts. Unhappily for the Mustangs, Sam Munroe is unable to accompany the team and his services will certainly be missed, for there are few more effective or energtic forwards in the college loop than the tall Londoner.

Orv Zavitz will be on hand to fill the breach and while he lacks the height, experience and finesse of Munroe, the young recruit is capable of playing a sterling game. Whitwell, another newcomer, is another hustler with spirit galore and his play as a forward has been very encouraging. If Capt. Evan Hayter is feeling fit again, Queen's fans will likely see a real exhibition of ball-handling and defensive play, for Hayter at his best is smoothness personified. Ron Hogan, Mustang centre, has yet to hit his stride but if he holds Newman in control, the former Walkerville boy will have done his job. Gunn, veteran guard and Cherniak, who is playing his first year as a Mustang, will team up with Hayter and will attempt to force the Tricolor into a long range shooting game. Howie Clarke, capable guard, will complete the roster, leaving two alternates.

Incidentally Coach Alex Munroe claims that his charges have rid themselves of all their bad basketball and he expects them to provide the kind of game they are capable of.

Mustang, Basketeers Play Queen's Tonight

With the senior intercollegiate basketball schedule rapidly being completed, Western's Mustangs take to the road this coming week-end, playing in Kingston tonight and journeying to McGill for their first meeting with the Redmen tomorrow evening.

While these games do not loom as important as next week's encounters, the results might have a distinct bearing on the final say as to the location of the championship. Western could upset a few apple-carts by winning both games, though this is highly improbable. They could aid Queen's and Varsity immeasurably by taking McGill in Montreal on Saturday, which is still more unlikely.

Regardless of how Western behaves in Montreal, Queen's have to defeat the Mustangs here tonight to retain their place as contenders and this should not be hard to do.

After a strenuous game in Toronto last Friday, the tired gladiators from Queen's stepped into London and were not unduly extended to defeat the fresh Western U. warriors. The line-up was switched also to give some of the alternates a chance to go for a longer portion of the game, and they responded by making Western travel fast to keep up with them.

Queen's should turn in their best game of the season tonight, for while the odd player has been consistent; some of the boys through various causes have been in one game and out the next. Tonight every one of them should be in perfect form and if they are Western are going to take home a beating.

Meds '35 And '36 Plan To Hold Great Combined Hop

Goodness! Gracious! Ambrose! The gentlemen students(quoted from a 1932 Jounral) of Meds '35 and '36 are becoming uppish, even snooty and not a little selfish. Dame Rumor was wrong again, there will be no posters or any advertising for the combined dance. With a very large, excellent floor at their disposal, only a very limited select few will be allowed to attend — Invitations will be necessary and are being issued to members of both years and their friends.

It really does seem a shame, when the evening will be an entirely new departure in the line of year festivals — but no measure, however drastic, has been overlooked to remove the crowding prevalent at last year's dance, and still retain all the good features of a great party. The souvenir program has been designed and novelties of all kinds will be procured — Lucky Meds '35-'36—and their friends.

The scene is Ontario Hall and February 24th the date.

GRINDING OUT THE GRADES

Already a device has been patented by an Ohio State University professor, which automatically corrects certain types of examinations and calculates their scores. This is the last straw. If we're to be graded by a machine-monster, let's demand a mechanical instructor, too.

Negative Side Wins In Philosophy Class Debate

world is open to the greatest doubt. The processes involved in mental and physical causation differ radically, but because of the insecure position of physical causation the mental equivalent also rests on an insecure base.

Mr. Brunton, speaking for the Affirmative stressed the belief in determinism which has been held by mental and moral reformers, such as St. Paul, Spinoza, and Spenser through all ages of the world. Mr. Bruton also mentioned the value of ethics in the life of the world, naming industry, justice and benevolence as three main ethical virtues.

Mr. Kent, in upholding the Negative question, stated that determinism fails as a philosophy because it leaves out so much, since any philosophy must explain three things, itself, the world, and ethical values. In affirming that determinism cannot explain any of the three conditions of philosophy, Mr. Kent maintained that it had not been proved that mind and matter are causal.

Masefield Completely Won Hearts of Large Audience

Of quite a different tone were the lines from the sequence of Shakespearean sonnets, in praise of beauty. These sonnets represent the most artistic in Masefield's work, and set out in "simple, sensuous and passionate" language the essence of the poets philosophy.

Masefield read some of his lines on "Hope", of which, he said, the generation is sadly in need. He believes this world to be but a shadow of a better after life, and that in moments of exaltation we see glimpses of this future realm, to which truth, courage, and love of beauty bring us ever nearer.

In concluding Masefield read from "The Everlasting Mercy": "How swift the summer goes, Forget-me-not, pink, rose.
The young grass when I started
And now the hay is carted,
And now my song is ended."

WILL THE FRESHMEN EVER LEARN?

Charles J. Weckerle '36, who paid a $25 fine in Waukegan, Ill., municipal court Friday for threatening his sweetheart with a pistol, still insists he will marry the girl if she accepts him.

Before Police Magistrate Clarence Brown imposed the $25 fine, he exacted a pledge from Weckerle in which the latter promised to use less violent means of courting in the future.

—Wisconsin Daily Cardinal.

On Hearing John Masefield

Who is so childish, reading lines of verse,
To fear that here the poet ends, to look
Beyond were sacrilege, and charms disperse
Should one survey the author of the book?
Ah no! To-night I drank a rare old wine
That filled me with a deep tranquillity,
And those strange joys af sailor-folk were mine
Who view firsthand the ocean's pageantry;
I heard across the downs the hounds in cry,
At dusk I saw the huntsmen homeward file,
And hope that glows in England's sunset sky,
And in the sad sweet pathos of his smile
I have been down to the sea again, and found
An everlasting beauty in its sound.

AT THE CAPITOL

"NO MAN OF HER OWN"

With Clark Gable, Carol Lombard, and Dorothy Mackaill.

Entirely revised from the original story, "No Bed of Her Own," the play at the Capitol provides discreet entertainment under the title of "No Man of Her Own."

Clark Gable as Jerry Stewart, a card shark, with a blacker beard than ever, due probably to bad camera effects, presents a good performance. Stewart gambles high and wide in New York, and then goes to a little quiet western town to keep out of sight for a while. There he falls in love with a little country girl, Carol Lombard, (rather smart for a country girl) never goes back on a coin—so when the coin says "Marry the girl" he does and brings her back into the racket. She finds out his game; Stewart goes to jail to clear up his past record—and then he returns in time to greet the stork.

Dorothy Mackaill is good in the role of the shark's colleague. In spite of the fact that Carol Lombard is too haughty for her humble role, she does well. Gable is still the debonair, heart-breaking hero. It's good fun with plenty of wise-cracks. A—.

AT THE TIVOLI

THE SILVER DOLLAR
with
Edward Robertson, Bebe Daniels and Aline McMahon.

Edward Robertson as Yates Martin is a Colorado Miner in the late 19th century. Contrary to the wishes of his wife, Sarah, he falls for every double-crossing game in the West.

Martin's other weakness is politics. With his increasing silver returns as well as rising political powers he manages to become lieutenant-governor of the state.

Faced with the problem of losing his senatorship through a scandal, Yates buys off a 30-day senatorship, goes to Washington where he and his "Lily" are married. His drink with the President did not come off.

Then the silver dollar is taken for a ride and the country goes on the gold standard. The Martins are left holding the bag—a worthless old mine. The gallant Sarah offers Yates a share of the money realized in some lucky investments but Yates refusing, asks about his son, Mark. The lady says, "O.K., Mark is being married," and off she goes in her two horse coach.

Finally, just on the point of being made post-master of Denver, Yates dies, and true to his prophesy is buried in a silver casket. It is well worth seeing even if you only appreciate the flowing robes of our Victorian parents. A—.

Book Chats

By R.M.

This is a dynamic stage in the history of the human race. Our economic, political, social, religious institutions are all being subjected to sharp scrutiny; the signs of change are seen in the appearance of the Commonwealth Federation, a new political party, and in the birth of such concepts as Technocracy. Man is compassed about with anxious questionings as to his all-sufficiency, as never before: a few years ago the twentieth century was still regarded as a new era and it was prophesied that science would dominate and control all natural forces for the benefit of mankind. The reaction from this extreme position finds concrete expression in a new religious movement—the Oxford Movement—popularly termed the Salvation Army in evening dress. This venture in faith is bound to have repercussions on our social and literary scheme of things. With this in mind it has been thought advisable to give a brief outline of the hand-book of the Oxford Movement "For Sinners Only" by A. J. Russell (Hodder & Stoughton).

Much has been said and heard recently of the Oxford Group Movement. One who is desirous of learning more of its origin, aims, and power to change lives would do well to read "For Sinner's Only."

The writer of this book, a journalist by profession, started out to find some knowledge for his paper about the Oxford Group. In searching for it he came in such close contact with the Movement that his own life was changed.

Russell says the Movement is not an organization. No one can tell its numbers. There is no joining or resigning. You are either in or out by the quality of the life you live. The book stresses absolute honesty, absolute purity, absolute unselfishness, and absolute Love.

Another aspect of the group is that besides confessing their sins to God they believe in confessing them to others, which confession they term sharing. The reason given for such sharing is that it helps some to realize more fully God's forgiveness. Mr. Russell emphatically states that he has never heard anything said in open meeting which would offend the sense of propriety.

Further, the author writes of what is called "Two way Prayer" viz. petition and quiet listening in to reply. This is an important aspect of their meetings and activities.

It is interesting to know that the group does not ask for money. But money offerings are gratefully received by them.

"For Sinner's Only" contains many instances of remarkable conversions and experiences. It gives a glowing account of the work carried on at Geneva, during the preparation for the Disarmament Conference there. Their message began to lift the feeling of depression and put new hope in place of despair among the conference representatives.

The book closes with the thought that it may do for the twentieth century what Wesley did for the eighteenth century. Who knows.

JUNIORS ADVANCE IN PLAY-OFFS

Junior O.H.A. Team Holds Belleville 3-3

Successfully staving off Belleville's desperate last period rally, Queen's O.H.A. Junior team advanced to the second round play-off by holding the Quintet towners to a 3-all tie.

By a strange coincidence "Johnny" Wing tallied all the Tricolor goals, while "Tarzan" Rigby was responsible for the three Belleville markers.

Queen's went to work protecting their lead and by the end of the second stanza were leading six goals on the round, which lead was whittled down to three in the final spasm.

This Queen's team looks better every time out, and if steady improvement continues is apt to go places. "Johnny" Wing again led the team and was given great support by Bain, Brydon, Corrigan, Lewis and Christie. Corrigan pressed into service to relieve McCuaig who was kept out on his physicians advice, gave a real account of himself. The defence was again capably taken care of by Smith, Gibson and Pettit, while James' performance in goal was well nigh perfect.

Rigby, who gained all his team's goals, Thompson a student at the Deaf and Dumb Institute, Covert and Harvey were the standouts for Belleville, while Sinfield in the nets also turned in a clever game.

As if to prove the old adage that the best defensive is an offensive, the Tricolor started with the opening gong, and instead of waiting for Belleville to carry the play quickly went on the attack and clearly outplayed the homesters. The students hit their stride early, but were not able to score till sixteen minutes had elapsed. Wing got the counter on a solo effort which ended in Sinfield being pulled out and the puck indged in the empty cage. A feature was the great showing of Queen's relief forward line, especially of young "Vinny" Corrigan. Early in the second period the Quintes looked dangerous when Wing was penalized, but a determined Tricolor defence turned aside their best efforts. Shortly, later with the Collegians again shorthanded Belleville tried frantically, but were not able to dent the twine. Repeatedly James saved sensationally.

With conditions reversed Queen's sartanned attack bore fruit and "Johnny" Wing tallied two pretty goals, one on a weaving rush, the other following a face off near the Belleville net. Covert and Thompson broke through occasionally, but they could not beat James.

Playing two men short to start the final period Queen's again fended off the homsters' frantic thrusts, and sparkling net-tending by James repeatedly turned them back. They were not to be denied, however, and finally Rigby's shot slipped in over James' shoulder. Belleville continued to rush four men abreast and again Rigley drove through for a counter. Penalties at this time were costly to the Tricolor and once more Rigley counted from close range.

Belleville Loses First Game To Tricolor

Featuring a brilliant third period scoring rally, and superb defensive stand when left two men short through penalties, Queen's Junior O.H.A. squad took a three goal lead in the first of the play-offs at the Harty Arena.

Playing stellar hockey all the way Wally Elmer's well-coached team solved Belleville's "packed defence" in the final frame to trounce the visitors four goals to one. The game was better than any of the group contests and showed the Tricolor strong in all departments. James had a fairly easy time in goal but made several saves that bordered on the sensational, while the one that beat him was well earned. On defence Gibson and Smith proved a constant barrier to visiting attackers, while the former displayed very clever stick-handling and notched a pretty goal to tie the score. Wing was a constant threat on the attack, while his stellar backchecking was a big factor in Queen's defensive play. Bryden, Bain and McQuaig were the pick of the forwards and between them provided the winning margin, each being responsible for one goal. The rest of the team contributed many good plays and all shared in the victory.

For Belleville Covert and McGuire were the most effective performers, with the former showing a great burst of speed. The visitors elected to play a defensive game after getting away to an early lead and for the first two periods were fairly successful, but in the last chapter Queen's staged a scoring orgy which resulted in getting a substantial lead for the return fixture.

1st Period.

Play started with a fast open brand of hockey, and within the opening minute Wing and Gibson were through to test Sinfield. Bryden also contributed some clever rushes, while McGuire's sweep check was wreaking havoc with Queen's offensive efforts. Five minutes before the end of the period a Belleville rush resulted in a scramble in front of the students' net and an overzealous goal umpire ruled a goal. It was disallowed, however, and the offending judge removed. The visitors notched their first and only counter from another scramble with about two minutes of the period left to play.

2nd Period

With the opening face-off Covert sped down the centre, but James saved sensationally. He repeated shortly, but failed to get his shot away. Johnny Wing worked his way through, but shot wide of the net. After ten minutes of play Gibson tied the score on a nice solo effort and hard drive from the blue line, which completely fooled Sinfield. He almost got another a moment later, but the puck got away from him at the goal mouth.

Queen's attack was better organized during this period, and their close checking kept the visitors from getting into a real scoring position.

Probably realizing that they had better go to work if they were to take a lead to Belleville the Tricolor Juniors unleashed a savage scoring attack in the final period and quickly solving the Quinte "packed defence" ran in three goals and were outlucked on as many more. Bain put Queen's in front on a lonely solo effort when he stick-handled through, drew Sinfield out and lodged the puck in the empty net. McQuaig got the third on another fine individual play. These two goals supplied the needed impetus and the pace became hectic. McGuire was right through for Belleville, but James again made a fine save.

Bryden ended the scoring for the night when he drove a fast one into the upper corner.

The game was comparatively clean, all penalties being for minor infractions of the rules.

Line-up:

Belleville: Goal, Sinfield; defence, Rigby, Hogan; centre, Barriage; wings, Harvey, McGuire; alternates, Covert, Morgan, Howie, Goyer.

Queen's: Goal, James; defence, Gibson, Smith; centre, Wing; wings, Lewis, Bain; alternates, Bryden, McQuaig, McNab, Pettit.

previous experience. He is very aggressive and always in condition. The heavy class is represented by Fairlie, formerly heavyweight champion of R.M.C. Smith, one hundred and twenty-five; Fossing, one hundred and thirty-five; Steward, one hundred and seventy-five, are all new comers, but had to have class to survive the elimination for a place on the team. Among the wrestlers Johnston, one hundred and twenty-five; Shurke, one hundred and sixty-five; Watt, one hundred and seventy-five, and Gray, a heavyweight, were point winners on last year's team. Dick, one hundred and eighteen; Miller, one hundred and thirty-five; Fletcher, one hundred and forty-five, and Dimitrief, one hundred and fifty-five are new to the team, but Fletcher and Dimitrief have had considerable outside experience. Scully, Clarke and Porter are representing the fencers. This is the team that won second place in last year's assault.

SPORTS SLANTS

How do you like the Juniors now? This team is deserving of the best support possible. Only a few accompanied them to Belleville and missed a hot encounter.

By the way, Belleville upheld its reputation for being a serious minded hockey burg. They blamed the referee for all their troubles from tosing the game to an epidemic of flat feet. The services of the local constabulary, if any, were needed to get the ref. out of the rink intact.

* * * * * *

Queen's students can help wonderfully by packing the rink on the occasion of the next home game which will likely be with Peterboro. Watch for the date.

The B. W. & F. team now occupies the spotlight and their performance in Montreal will be watched with eagerness. It looks like our last hope for an Intercollegiate crown and the chances are bright.

And don't forget the big basketball menu to-night. The visit of Western will mark the end of senior ball unless the Tricolor gets into a playoff.

number was a selection of both old and new songs, some belonging to Old France and some to Canada proper. "Marianne s'en va-t-au moulin", "C'est la belle Francoise" and "A la claire fontaine" an old Normandy air had strong appeal. "Dans les chantiers" is a rollicking song reminding one of the little log shanties of the lumberman hidden snuggly in the bush in the depth of winter. "Un Canadien errant" was composed by Antoine Gerin-Lajoie in 1842 and deals with the North West Rebellion. "Petit Rocher" calls to mind a story of heroism rivalling that of Madeline de Vercheres. It was written on the banks of the Ottawa River by a trapper named Cadieux while he and an Indian were heading off a group of hostile Iroquois so that Cadieux's Huron wife and a party of his friends might get safely down the river. Later search found Cadieux's dead body and beside it the poem "Petit Rocher" written on birch bark with his own blood. — The first number ended with "Frére Jacques" one of the most amusing pieces on the program. There were four parts to it and each part was sung at a different time making it resemble a chimes.

As the second item of the program Professor T. F. Gelley sang two delightful numbers "Le lac" a poem by Lamartine with music by Niedermeyer and "Jardin d'amour" an old French air composed by Keel. Then Blossom Agnew, a talented violinist, played "Canzonetta" and "Allegro molto", the latter being especially fine and much appreciated by the audience. Next we heard Frances Robertson with her sweet soprano voice sing the "Bergerettes" which are old 18th century French airs. And then Lois Baker gave a splendid rendering of three piano solos "La fille aux Cheveux de lin", "Clair de lune" and "La Cathedrale englontie" which were all composed by Claude Debussy. "La Cathedrale engloutie" with its powerful chords made one think of the waves of the ocean beating on the shore. The program ended with another group of chansons among which were the well-known "Vive la Canadienne", "Sainte Marguerite" a cradle song with a modern interpretation, and a medley of popular choruses such as "Sur le pont d'Avignon" and "En roulant ma boule".

French Canadian Folksongs play an important part in the life of the habitant from the time he is a tiny babe in a crib until manhood. They are songs of vitality and pep and their jolly tunes like "Alouette" are liable to make people join in the choruses, thus they are good for community singing purposes. Ernest Gagnon has made a collection of over 4000 versions of them and Marius Barbeau in the Government Archives at Ottawa has a large collection and, moreover, has encouraged Quebec habitants to tour English speaking Provinces. The folksongs have a spirit and gayety that can be likened to the joy and happiness of springtime.

Ottawa Hockey Team Defeats Queen's 4-1

After battling sixty minutes to a one all tie at the Harty Arena, Tuesday night, Queen's and Ottawa College Intermediate ice squads decided that they had had enough and so called it a day, but some one finally got out a rule book and after a delay of half an hour or so, ten minutes overtime was played and Ottawa quickly ran in three goals. There were moments when play livened up, only to fall back again into a somewhat ding-dong state.

Ottawa presented a strong team when the Cowley Brothers and Kiefl were on the forward line, but with these men off the ice the visitors weren't nearly so impressive. Bill Cowley gave a great exhibition of stick-handling. Dan Cowley and Kiefl were not far back in the matter of effectiveness, while Devine also was prominent.

For the Tricolor, Storms, Kostuik and Arthurs looked best on the offensive and all contributed some clever rushes.

There was plenty of wood-chopping, but the referees were lenient and there were few unnecessary stoppages. Forsythe took one on the chin, but came right back looking for more, while Carr was also rendered momentarily "hors de combat." Apart from these there were no accidents of a serious nature.

Queen's took an early lead when Storms batted in the rebound off Arthur's shot, after about four minutes of play. There was little to choose between the teams as play ranged up and down the ice. The visitors showed to advantage in the centre forward passing area, but were not able to beat Forsythe, who turned in a sparkling exhibition of net-minding and on two or three occasions actually robbed the visitors on shots that were "labelled." Storms, Kostuick and Arthurs were the most effective Tricolor puck carriers, while Kiefl and Bill Cowley were best for the visitors during a somewhat lethargic first period.

The second stanza failed to provide any scoring and apart from a few clever rushes by the Cowley brothers and Kiefl there was not a great deal to enthuse over.

Repeatedly the visitors were outlucked when goals seemed certain, though at times clever saves by Forsythe were responsible for keeping the Ottawans off the score sheet.

Early in the final period Bill Cowley scored the equalizer from a scramble in front of the Queen's net. There were few real scoring chances during the balance of the frame. Bill Cowley and Kiefl looked dangerous on a few occasions, but they failed to tally. The homesters did not get going and only rarely was Benoit called upon to save.

The crowds were left "holding the light" at the conclusion of hostilities, but after a time it dawned on them that the game was over so they both went home. Some one was more interested, however, and finally talked the teams into an extra session, the last five minutes of which gave Ottawa a three goal margin.

Line-up:

Ottawa: Goal, Benoit; defence, Barnaby and McAndrew; centre, Bill Cowley; wings, Dan Cowley, Perrier; alternates, Kiefl, Fortier, Morvan, Devine, La Fleur.

Queen's: Goal, Forsythe; defence, Storms, Kostuick; centre, Arthurs; wings, Carr, Smith; alternates, Murphy, Morin, Wallace, Sheppard.

Referees: Ray Dougall, Billy Watts.

Sports Views

After a few days lay off, the Junior and Intermediate basketball squads see plenty of action tonight when they play preliminary games to the Western-Queen's battle.

Both teams entertain Napanee aggregations, and while the Intermediates are coasting along nicely with no losses as yet to their efforts, the Juniors cannot afford to fool around any longer if they are going to finish on top.

In the initial meeting of these teams, the Intermediates had little trouble in showing Napanee a few things about the game, and Pete Lewis' players can be counted upon to turn in a worth-while struggle on their own floor.

On the other hand Joe Josephson and his juniors dropped the first game to Napanee, and must show a reversal of form tonight to get back into the good graces of the fans, and incidently forge to the top. A much better game can be looked for, however, because they have improved steadily since their first encounter and Joe is all set for a win.

The B. W. & F. team got away last evening for Montreal where it will have a great responsibility to carry, namely, the retaining of the championship won last year.

The opposition should be strenuous, but coaches Jimmy Pews and Jack Jarvis have all the faith in the world in their men and look forward to another championship.

McMaster University look to be the class of the Senior "B" basketball group, although the issue is still in doubt. They defeated the other two teams in the loop, O.A.C. and R.M.C. both games being away from home, and therefore should have no trouble in taking the home games. However, the Cadets and Farmers are noted for their courage, while on foreign ground and the hunt is not over yet.

The Juniors are improving with every start and will likely meet Peterboro in the next round. The dates of this series have not been announced but fans are urged to keep in touch with players or newspapers, as it is not always possible to get the dates in the Journal.

By the way it is time a little more enthusiasm was being shown in this Junior team and its activities. Early in the season Wally Elmer predicted some nice things for his team and to date they have shown that they are capable of going places. How about packing the rink for the Peterboro game?

Meds. Interyear hockey dates have been announced as follows. Feb. 22nd, 1 to 2 p.m., Meds. '28 vs. '37. Feb. 23rd, 11 to 12 a.m., Meds. '33 vs. '34. Feb. 24th, 11 to 12 a.m., Meds. '35 vs. '36.

Mrs. W. Fyfe Gives Rembrandt Lecture

Mrs. W. H. Fyfe gave an illustrated address on Rembrandt before the Kingston Art Association, on Tuesday afternoon in the Douglas Library. By the courtesy of the Art Gallery of Toronto the lecture was illustrated by a series of slides reproducing many of the artist's most characteristic works and fifty framed reproductions of his paintings and drawings lined the walls of the room. Mrs. Fyfe depicted Rembrandt's life in its relation to his artistic career and interpreted his works to a most appreciative audience. The President of the Association, Dr. R. G. Trotter, afterwards called attention to the edition of facsimiiles of Rembrandt's etchings forming part of the Carnegie Art Collection in the Douglas Library, which, by the courtesy of Mr. Kyte and the Board of Library Curators, has been made accessible to members of the Art Association on Tuesday and Friday afternoons.

The next speaker in the series arranged by the Association's Executive will be Dr. Thomas Gibson, who will talk on Raeburn on February 28th.

Dr. Clarke Speaks On John Masefield

With numerous anecdotes and readings, Dr. G. H. Clarke spoke of John Masefield and his works at the recent meeting of the English Club.

Opening his talk with an account of an interview which he had with Mr. Masefield when he was in the Southern United States in 1926, Dr. Clarke went on to tell of the Poet Laureate's many adventures and of his literary heroes — Thomas Hardy, John Galsworthy, William Yeats, Sir Ronald Ross and Grenville Yarker. Of special interest to all was his account of Masefield's early life, beginning with his sailing ship experiences and his impoverished days in New York, and the story about Luke O'Connor, the poet's saloon employer, who was incidentally, one of his greatest admirers.

The chief influences on Masefield's early work were Duncan Campbell Scott's "Piper of Ariel" and Chaucer's "Parlement of Fowles" and it was from these that the young wanderer received for the first time an idea of what poetry could really be. He followed up this early interest by plunging into Keats, Wordsworth, Shakespeare, and other great masters, and soon began writing himself.

With the help of Yeats and Synge, his first book "Salt Water Ballads" was published, and after having been a free lance journalist and a member of the staff of the "Manchester Guardian" he became famous with his ultra-realistic poem "Everlasting Mercy". Its complement "The Widow in the Bye Street" followed, and with "Dauber" the best of his narrative poems, and "Reynard the Fox", distinctly Chaucerian, rank among the best of his works.

Dr. Clarke concluded by discussing Mr. Masefield's novels, plays, and efforts in literary criticism, and pointed out that in his opinion "August 1916" was one of the finest poems ever written about the Great War.

Second-hand American tires are exported to Serbia and Latvia to be made into footwear.

Masefield Thinks Radio Can Popularize Poetry

must have a lively interest in something," he said, "And you must also have wide interests so that you can appeal to your fellow men. The actual writing must follow this. You must have bold design, constant practice and you must make frequent mistakes. You must be in continuous rebellion against yourself. Newspaper work is good training in writing but a man should not continue as a newspaper writer if he is going to write pure literature. Newspaper work is excellent training because it develops the habit of expressing thoughts simply and accurately. This is invaluable to all young men."

Mr. Masefield recalled his experiences in the office of the Manchester Guardian. He wrote short leading articles three times a week, conducted a back page column of miscellaneous notes every day, beside writing book reviews and picture notices.

"It was very exciting work," said Mr. Masefield. "You used to come into the office about eight in the evening and go to work with your fellow employees. There was always a pleasurable feeling that you were co-operating with them to produce something which had not before existed and which was an actuality before you went home in the morning."

Mr. Masefield was asked if he wrote by inspiration or by hard work.

"I combine both," answered Mr. Masefield. "I sit down and work. Do you remember the old couplet,

'Sitting still and wishing won't make the nation great,
The good Lord sends the fishing but you must dig the bait.'

Well, that applies to writing, too."

In reply to the question, "Do you think that the advent of the steamship took the romance out of sailing?" Mr. Masefield replied in the negative and went on to say, "The coming of the steamship did not banish romance from the sea. Ships to-day are more beautiful and wonderful than they were in the sailing ship era. Some of the old ships did have a certain aura of romance but they were exceptional. The men who go down to the sea in ships have improved too. They are much cleverer and more scientific. The commander of a modern ship is a scientifically trained man. In the old shipping days this was not usually so."

Asked if the sailors of the sailing ship era were not more resourceful than the seamen of to-day, the Poet Laureate said he did not think so. He also stated that the men who went to sea now were on the whole a better lot than in former times.

"It was once said that the sea was the refuge of the dissolute and the desperate. This is not so to-day," said Mr. Masefield. "Of course there were some very splendid men among the old seamen but they were not as clever or skilled as modern seamen. The ships of to-day are better equipped and built than ever before. The men who handle them must be skilled or they will speedily get into difficulties. Then the equipment of a modern ship makes accidents more unlikely and gives the crew a better chance of meeting emergencies than ever before. In the old sailing ship days if a ship hit an iceberg she went down and as a rule her crew would be lost because the boats would be unfit for actual use or it would be impossible for her crew to get at them readily. Then, too, there was no wireless to call help from nearby ships."

Mr. Masefield told the story of the "Trevisa," a ship which was lost not many years ago in the mid-Pacific. The crew suddenly became aware that their ship was full of water. They swung out the boats rapidly as the ship sank under them. The captain had been torpedoed during the Great War and had learned that condensed milk was the most sustaining and compact food which could be carried in boats and consequently he had equipped his life-boats with it. The shipwrecked crew sailed 1700 miles to Mauritius hardly losing a man. "I don't think that the annals of the sea in former times can equal this feat. The men were given a teaspoonful of condensed milk every day and thanks to the Captain's scientific knowledge nearly all were saved," declared Mr. Masefield.

S. A. A. Opposed By Grumbler At Western

London, Ont. (C.I.P.) — The grumbler, a one sheet mimeographed newspaper has appeared on the campus here in open opposition to the legislation passed by the Students Administrative Assembly at a recent meeting which absolished the traditional initiation day-parade. Interviews with students throughout the halls composed the columns of the Grumbler and were confined to those who were antagonistic only to the Student Administrative Assembly. Co-ed opinion apparently amounted to little in the estimation of the editors of the newest campus journal, for it was totally absent.

Supplementing the Grumbler in its attack against the executive of the student body, a widely circulated petition appeared on the bulletin board at the school. It is expected that when a few more names become attached to the petition, it will be presented at the next meeting of the assembly, where it will likely be dealt with as any other correspondence.

The Gazette, official student publication, refused to side either with the students or the assembly. However, it upheld the action of the S.A.A., as a matter of good faith, and at the same time took the stand that the students were acting generally without giving the problem sufficient intelligent thought.

The administration of the university has placed itself on record as favoring the abolishment of the parade because of its so-called detrimental features. They claim that merchants from the city whose stores front on the route of the parade object to the tomato throwing and hazing which have been in evidence during the past five years.

Prefect Teskey Smith, speaking to the assembly remarked that if the S.A.A. did not take steps to abolish the parade, the administration would, and that ultimately all initiation activity would be brought to an end. Several students, commenting upon this statement remarked that if the S.A.A. were weak-kneed enough to act only with the opinion of the administration in mind, it would be a wise move for the assembly to resign and the administration function as the supreme student body executive.

Winning Queen's Debaters Justify Japanese Activities In Manchuria

Gilmour And Parker Are Given Decision Over Ottawa College

"Japan is in Manchuria by legal and moral right," asserted Mr. Eric Gilmour, who proposed the resolution "That this house approves of Japan's activities in Manchuria," in a recent debate against Ottawa University. Queen's were represented at home by Eric Gilmour and John Parker, and against Loyola in Montreal by Harold McLearn and Phil Stuchen. The Queen's debaters were awarded the decision at home, but lost away to the Loyola team who won their way into the final of the Intercollegiate debates.

ERIC GILMOUR

"Japan's vast population can only be supported if Manchuria is economically accessible," Mr. Gilmour argued; moreover Japanese financial interest has been a dominant factor in the history of Manchuria whereas China's activities are prompted by a militant nationalism. The present situation is the result of China's persistent refusal to take advantage of the conciliatory policy of Japan, who is now forced to take action as a result of the lack of order, the danger of communism, and China's failure to observe treaties. Mr. Gilmour declared that China has forfeited the right to be considered as a sovereign state, and since the only hope of good order in Manchuria comes from without, more and more the world must look towards the good offices of Japan in that province.

Mr. P. J. Macdonald, for the opposition, declared that the opinions of the League and of all the leading countries of the world cannot be mistaken. By her invasion of Manchuria, which is an integral part of China; Japan has broken five important treaties, including the Nine Power Treaty, the League of Nations Coverant and the Kellogg-Buard Pact. Mr. Macdonald further declared that Japanese militarism, which had provoked in the Economic boycott a gesture of indignation from China, was the prime cause of the present situation in Manchuria.

In support of the motion Mr. John Parker asserted that China has been guilty of systematic persecution of Japanese nationals in Manchuria, and has refused to honour the treaties which guarantee to Japan her future economic development, and thereby make possible the policy of industrialization which alone can solve Japan's population problem. Dr. W. Fyfe Returns From Lecture Tour

The Principal returned on Saturday from a visit to Southern Ontario where he has been addressing various organizations.

Dr. Fyfe, who left Kingston on Monday, February 13th, included in his itinerary Brantford, Stratford, Toronto and St. Catherines.

At Brantford Dr. Fyfe spoke to the Service Club, and in Stratford to the Teachers' Association. In St. Catherines Dr. Fyfe addressed the local Alumni Association.

University Employment Service Sparing No Effort In Attempt To Find Jobs For Students

"It is not necessary to explain to Queen's students the difficulty of the employment situation," stated Mr. Gordon J. Smith, manager of the University Employment Service, in a recent interview with a Journal representative, "but we are leaving no stone unturned to hunt out such employment, as may exist anywhere in this country, permanent or temporary, for graduates or for students."

"The Employment office has many hundreds of Canadian organizations of all sorts on its lists," Mr. Smith went on, "and during the past months or more has been communicating with all of these to secure employment for students and graduates. The results, however, this year have been extremely disappointing to date. But no effort is being spared, and at least the valuable contacts which Queen's has built up with Canadian industry through the Employment Service during past years are being zealously maintained, so that as soon as normal conditions return Queen's will still be to the fore in University placement work, with the consequent advantage to all concerned."

The Queen's Employment Service under the management of Mr. G. J. Smith of the Alumni Association has achieved an enviable reputation throughout Canada since its inception almost fifteen years ago. Although this year the employment situation has so far proved unfavourable, it was very different prior to 1930, when the demand for men and women of University training was only met with difficulty.

The Employment office now has application forms ready for students to fill in; they can be obtained from Room 210, the Douglas Library. It should be noticed that

Two of the most outstanding men ever to wear Queen's colors. The Tricolor's two points in the recent B.W.F. Meet were garnered by them. Both won Intercollegiate Championships this year for the fourth consecutive time. Reading from left to right—Peever, 145 lbs. boxing champ, and Hosking, 175 lbs. wrestler.

Varsity Wins Intercollegiate Assault At Montreal With Nine Victories

H. Hosking And M. Peever, Only Tricolor Fighters Obtaining Points, Have Now Won Four Straight Intercollegiate Championships

By Scotty McGowan.

By virtue of 6 wins in wrestling and 3 in Boxing Varsity won the B.W.F. Assault, McGill came next with 6 points, and Queen's last with 2 points. Nevertheless it was the Queen's boys who "Stole the show." This statement does not come originally from the writer, but from one of the best Sports Editors in Canada, on a Montreal paper. He saw the assault both nights, and said that he had never witnessed the equal. Lack of experience and very indifferent judging were responsible for Queen's seeming lack of success. Making any reference to judges is supposed to be poor sportsmanship in most cases, but the decisions given to Jimmy Campbell, Ran MacDonald, and May were nothing short of putrid. Campbell and May were forced into over time when it was evident that they were the winners in the regulation 10 minutes. MacDonald won both the 1st and 2nd rds. in a decisive manner only to have his opponent given a sufficient number of points for the third round to wipe out his well established lead. MacDonald dropped his opponent in the first two rounds with hard rights, but all this was of no avail. Peever left no doubt in his bouts as to who was champion, scoring a 3rd round K.O. against Sinclair from Varsity the first night and a 1st round K.O. against Swift of McGill the second night. Henry Hosking set what looks like an intercollegiate record when he secured 2 falls on MacLean of McGill in 45 seconds. Incidentally both the Queen's boys have won 4 straight championships.

The wrestlers missed the guidance of Coach Bews who, due to illness, was forced to miss the Assault for the first time in over 20 years. His boys were the victims of the well-known "Varsity Ride," a procedure in which one man gets on top and stays there refusing to wrestle or attempt to get a fall. It is this gesture that has made wrestling in intercollegiate circles increasingly unpopular. Figures don't lies and the Queen's wrestlers had 7 falls to their credit and University of Toronto had only 2 falls secured by Grey in the first night, and yet they won 6 championships. For years officials have been trying to eliminate this "Ride", but to date have not been successful, it is high time somthing was done to open up the game and give a chance to those men who wish to wrestle and are not content to go in there and just lie on top of their opponent.

As was stated above Queen's stole the show by their good sportsmanship and supreme courage. It is always hard to pick outstanding battles, but the following will illustrate why our team was paid that compliment. Carlyle, who represented Queen's in 165 lbs. wrestling, was knocked out in the first minute of his bout with Shute of Varsity, but he was allowed a few moments rest to clear his head, and he then went ahead and gave a fine display, wrestling tooth and nail to lose a close decision, his opponent being unable to throw him. It took some courage to do that after being knocked out.

Jimmy McGill fought toe to toe with Jack Rapsey the Varsity captain veteran of four Inter-collegiates. From the first it was apparent that Rapsey knew too much for McGill, but just the same Jimmy kept walking right in trading punch for punch. Time and again it looked as if he would have to take the long count, but nothing doing, he just kept on trying, fought his man to a standstill and fought his way into the heart of everyone at the fights.

Carr at 165 lbs. got a great hand from friend and foe after one of the greatest displays of gameness ever witnessed. McLennan of McGill K.O.'d Elson of Varsity the first night and was looking to an easy win the second night, because it was only Carr's second

What Women Have Done In Law Discussed At First Fireside Talk

Miss Vera Parsons Describes Training Required For Post

"What Women Have Done In Law" was the theme of the first Fireside Talk when Miss Vera Parsons, M. A., a member of the firm of Hoskins, Graham and Parsons, Toronto, spoke to the members of Levana. Giving evidence to the fact that most people prefer men as lawyers, the speaker advised a young legal graduate to enter a firm where there are several men partners as in this way much of the business with women clients would fall to her. The desired, though not compulsory, requirements for entrance to Osgoode Hall are four years' college work with a year of postgraduate work, making law one of the most highly trained professions for women.

Miss Parsons paid a tribute to Clara Brett Martin who was Canada's first woman lawyer entering Osgoode Hall in the nineties. Since that time the number of women graduates each year has been small, averaging about three a year. Twelve of these are in general practice in Toronto and eight have secured government positions. Another phase of law work which has generally been done by women is that in connection with Insurance and Trust Companies. Miss Parsons said in work with financial companies, a graduate woman lawyer is apt to become a stengrapher with legal training. Although in this capacity she becomes a valuable employee of the company, there is little prospect for advancement. Therefore, Miss Parsons struck a new note when she advised to neglect stenography if thinking of a law career.

Students entering law school without a university degree must take four years at Osgoode Hall; graduates take three years. All students must be articled to lawyers in order to acquire a knowledge of the practical side of law and as men are considered more useful than women in this capacity, it is extremely hard for women to become articled. Beginners' salaries are small and financial backing for the first five or ten years is practically a necessity. A woman entering a firm is usually given a small salary with a percentage on her own practice which will consist mostly of cases for women, often of a domestic nature.

In connection with cases of this type, a woman lawyer in a firm has an advantage, as domestic cases are generally passed on to her by the senior partners.

It is advisable to have some knowledge of book-keeping, dialectics and oratory along with a clear brain and an excellent memory. Most women do solicitor's work, though many lawyers do barrister's work as well. "I do not advise a girl to take up law unless she is intensely interested in it," said Miss Parsons who ended her address by citing several of her more dramatic cases.

Deutsche Akademie Gives Queen's Books

The "Deutsche Akademie" at Munich, an institution whose object is to promote cultural relations between Germany and foreign nations, has presented a number of German books to the Douglas Library. They are mainly fiction, but some works on medicine are also contained in the collection. The books will be on exhibition with the other recent acquisitions of the Library. Students are invited to use them freely, as they were given expressly for their benefit.

Miss Vera Parsons Stresses Difficulties Which Face Women Choosing Law As A Profession

By Helen Kennedy

Maintaining a somewhat discouraged attitude toward the prospects for feminine success in the field of Law, Miss Vera Parsons, when interviewed by the Journal, stressed the difficulties which face the prospective student. "These," Miss Parsons said, "are extremely low salaries, the almost prohibitive cost of initiating a private practice, and, at present, the great difficulty of securing any salaried position in a law office."

Believing that an intensive period of training is the best background of the profession, Miss Parsons has obtained her Master's degree in English and History from the University of Toronto and has done post-graduate work at Bryn Mawr College, and is at present a member of the Law firm of Hoskins, Graham and Parsons, of Toronto.

In answer to a question about specific courses to be taken in preparation for law work, Miss Parsons recommended studies in international law, jurisprudence and courses in modern history which include a great deal of research work.

The interesting question of the salary range for women lawyers was one on which Miss Parsons did not feel qualified to speak, since salaries varied with firms and with the capabilities of the individuals concerned. "But there is no comparison with other professions where invariably the initial salaries for trained graduates are higher," Miss Parsons said.

Replying to the question of her personal choice in the branches of law work, Miss Parsons said "I prefer the court work and have specialized in this department."

Learning At First Sight

As this term narrows down and the spring fever begins to set in, among the many thoughts haunting college students is surely to be found a shrinking feeling that it's about time to start a review of the term's work, and to look over the jumbled notes taken in lectures. If that's all there was to it, there really should not arise any undue worry for a moderate amount of study, concentration and common sense would assure the prospective student candidate every chance of success in the coming examinations. But unfortunately that's not all there is to it. We mentioned earlier a review of lecture notes, and our assurance of success was based on the student possessing a comprehensive, adequate and accurate set of notes.

But we quickly ask "How many students possess reliable notes for all their courses?" "Very few", we immediately answer our own question. This may come as a surprise to those conscientious few who are the fortunate owners of competent sets of notes obtained at the cost of untiring effort at note-taking, revising, polishing, verifying, planning, typing and proof reading—minor considerations in comparison with our next point — that the meticulous note-taker, anxious to get down everything the professor says, misses the most useful part of a lecture, so great is his concentration in the matter of putting on paper everything uttered by the lecturer. It is not surprising, then, that when our friend the note-taker returns to his dreary little room and starts to revise his notes, he finds that his work of the morning is in a jumbled, and discouraging state. He may have a whole series of points, but not infrequently they are meaningless, incoherent and useless without the explanatory remarks of the lecturer which he missed in his feverish attempt to take down the entire lecture.

It is only fair to assume, then, that the student with such a set of notes is relatively in no more encouraging position than the one who has no notes at all. The former has a series of notes which he does not understand, and consequently he has little hope of being able to learn and remember for examinations or any other purposes; the latter has no lecture notes, but he has a fair understanding of the course because instead of dissipating his energy on choleric note-taking he wisely applied his resources of mind in following the given explanations. It is generally accepted that there is no time to learn anything like the time it is being discussed. For this reason, learning at first sight, if we may be permitted the expression, is of utmost importance.

This is not an attempt to put forth the claim that learning at first sight is infallible or the ultimate in the educational field, nor to disparage the efforts of the meticulous note-takers. We have, however, a real solution to the problem. Printed notes should be handed to the students in every course. It is obvious that with such notes—prepared by the lecturing staff — the student could give his undivided attention to the lecture itself, and would leave at the end of the hour satisfied that he understood what had been said. Some time later in the day, or even at a later date, he could turn to his printed notes for a concentrated study of them. To the cries of cost which might arise in official quarters, we can unhesitatingly say that the students would be only too glad to pay generously for this service.

Verbal Inadequacies

Of all the faculties of man, that of inventiveness has given him some of his greatest pleasures, and has brought him some of his greatest griefs. Civilization in all its complexity is the invention of man, but along with its benefits, such as medical science and congenial arts—are the curses of war and social injustice. Probably the most important inventions of man, using the word invention in its broad sense, are speech and machinery. These inventions are his great triumphs and have become the very essence of his being, so much so that we no longer think of them apart from man.

The latter of the two has been attacked time and again for the baleful influence it has exercised on man. Oswald Spengler in the realms of philosophy, D. H. Lawrence in literature, and now the Technocrats for the popular mind, are inveighing against the tyranny of machines which man created for his own benefit, and which have now turned like a horrible Frankenstein, and are destroying him—both physically and mentally.

However in regard to speech, few people have looked at it from this point of view, and few if any realize the tremendous influence this, the invention of man to clarify and express thought, has had in obfuscating and preventing it.

Words are used so frequently that their meanings become fixed, and one word has to stand for many delicate nuances of thought. Whenever an individual has a thought, he has to express this thought in words, and the only words he can use if he wants to be understood, are the words that are in common use; but these words must be used in expressions which have acquired a certain meaning. Hence it finally turns out that the words determine the thought, or else the individual cannot express himself at all. Thought must thus conform to words, which defeats the prime purpose of language.

This explains why many modern poets and prosateurs have to invent new words in order to express their exact meaning. There is real justification in this procedure, for an artist must master his material and express his every shade of emotion. By extension, we can apply this to the modernists in music and painting.

The necessity for proper expression justifies the use, but not the indiscriminate use of foreign words, for, as each language is the expression of a peculiar type of genius, so each language has certain words or expressions which can seize the meaning of the thought far better than any expression in another language.

It is true that as time goes on the vocabulary of every language increases, but as time goes on civilization becomes more complex, and more events and shades of emotion arise, and must be expressed. Hence we must be tolerant of the introduction of new expressions and words into our language, we must endeavor to avoid hackneyed and trite expressions, and we must express ourselves forcibly and be truthful to our thoughts when either speaking or writing. —McGill Daily.

Immaturity

College undergradnates of today are being criticized for their immaturity. The basis for this criticism lies in the fact that students are unable to express themselves suitably—especially in writing—when occasion demands it. In other words they cannot "act their age". This may not be the case in all universities, as much depends on the age and experience of the student when he enters college. On some campuses, however, there are a large number of students who are in their teens. They gradnate from high school when fifteen or sixteen and soon after enrol at a university. Is it any wonder that they are immature? Throughout an eleven-year school period they have been continually "spoonfed" by their teachers. Scarcely a step has been taken, in any kind of work, that has not been approved first by the teacher. Notes are dictated verbatim and very often memorized. The pupil is given very little opportunity to think for himself. To depart from his teacher's opinion is disastrous. Consequently every years thousands of intellectual parasites are entering universities. Having acquired the habit of depending upon someone else to explain their difficulties they are unable to grasp the full significance of a college course. They are confronted by problems that appear impossible of solution. As a result they do not make a success of their work.

Those who have been out in the world before coming to college have a distinct advantage. They know what they want to study and how to go about it. Their aim is definite, and in most cases they attain success. It is then that they realize the value of experience as a teacher.

Numerous prominent men of today have never attended college. They left school at an early age and went to work. Little by little they advanced. Finally they reached their goal — success. They developed clear thinking, sane judgment, and an infinite capacity for leadership. They discovered their ability and used it to their own advantage. They became self-educated and compared favorably with university graduates. They may have known "small Latin and less Greek" nevertheless they climbed ambition's ladder. Having gone into the world they learned to think for themselves.

Contrast their advantage with the drawback of the high school student. It is true that he may read all kinds of literature and broaden his general outlook on life. If, however, he is restrained from expressing his opinion in his early student days he will find great difficulty in overcoming his so-called "immaturity" when he goes to college.—H.C.T.

Winning Debaters Justify Japan's Manchurian Policy

amples of Chinese bad faith, Mr. Parker concluded, "Japan has always sought to preserve order in Manchuria because only in such order can she find the basis for the peaceable solution of her own economic problems."

Mr. MacDougall, seconding the opposition, reiterated that Japan hoped eventually to rule China and had directed her policy for years to this end. He denied that Japan had any right to be in Manchuria, and quoted the Nakamura incident and the Mukden explosion as examples of sheer political opportunism on Japan's part. Mr. MacDougall added that by refusing to accept the findings of the Lytton Commission Japan had defied the League and the whole world, forming the new state of Manchukno.

"The fundamental question," said Mr. Gilmour in his summing up, "is whether China is a sovereign state. Manchurian banditry, raids on the railways, and the Korean massacre have shown that she cannot impose peace in the Far East." On the other hand the whole trend of Japan's policy has been toward maintaining good order in Manchuria, and this alone can prevent the outbreak of another world war.

The judges, Father Keating, Colonel Megloughlin and Dr. Mackenzie Naughton, gave a decision in favour of Queen's University at the close of the debate, which was broadcast over the Queen's station CFRC. Mr. George Wallace, President of the Debating Union, was in the chair.

CO-OPERATIVE LIVING

Iowa State College at Ames is probably one of the pioneers in the co-operative scheme of Student housing and eating. In 1924 the first experiment was made in a house caring for 16 girls. The scheme worked so well that one of the regular dormitories housing 65 women was opened on a co-operative basis. The girls did all the work in the hall under the supervision of a house-mother. By the fall of 1931 it seemed expedient to open another co-operative hall housing 100 women. The total cost per week for both board and room does not exceed $5.40. This means a splendid fireproof modern hall and in as good a room as the campus affords. Iowa State College has always been noted for her splendid housing facilities.

During the summer of 1932 the college felt the necessity of opening a co-operative hall for men. It has met with great success and enthusiasm from the 63 residents. The cost is but $5.00 per week for board and room. Although it was necessary to provide a somewhat larger budget for the food for the men it was possible to reduce the price of room rent for them on account of the type of hall used. A woman does the cooking while all other work in the hall is done by the men.

This winter one of the eleven sororities has undertaken co-operative living. The house expenses are greatly reduced. The members feel a closer fellowship. The same splendid feeling predominates in four co-operative homes.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Dear Sir:

Some mystery lies behind the fact that Solomon of all people, should have gone on record as finding something enigmatic in the way of a man with a maid. It may be that the patriarch of benedicts was unduly influenced by the presence of a couple of wives at his elbow when he wrote. In any case Solomon's remark has lived, to become the central text of a million storybooks, to become an important tenet in the credo of twentieth century adolescence. The simplest and most direct of psychological tendencies has been so misrepresented by the abnormal imaginations of many novelists as to appear now shrouded in mystery, haloed with sanctity, and in general incomprehensible to the direct mind of the normal man. And as one result of this lack of understanding, the sons and daughters of men are aught to approach the mountainous molehill of sex only from its perpendicular and unscalable side.

With the over-rated priveleges of adult life almost within reach, and the developed intelligence awaiting only a purging of illusions to reach its maximum of efficiency, young men and women, college students for instance are to be found delaying their normal progress by throwing themselves whole-heatedly into the settlement of unimportant side issues, such as co-education, which has really little bearing on the question of the social relationship of male and female.

For an understanding of sex may no more be acquired in college than an appreciation of the finer points of gastronomy may be developed in a soda fountain. Sex knowledge is of course disseminated among college students, sometimes, to a slight extent, officially, much as it is disseminated among the younger employes in an insurance office or a canning factory, but knowledge is never more than a short step towards the attainment of understanding, which is something permanent and immutable. Knowledge comes quickly and goes, subject to the fickle interests of youth and the vagaries of memory, but as Tennyson knew, understanding which is wisdom, lingers as long as man's natural powers may be retained.

Whether students mingle freely in classes and houses, or live and work in complete segration makes little final difference from a social point of view. Modern students enjoy, or endure, a degree of intimacy which would have been regarded a few years ago as a certain means of committing moral suicide; our children, if any, will probably attain a much greater degree of social intimacy and post-graduate life does not seem to be greatly affected by these changes. Man is the most adaptible of the animals and whatever degree of intimacy is allowed by current moral fashions is bound to be accepted as natural and unexciting by the youth of the period.

Nevertheless the sex "problem" is still occasionally the centre of a tempest in a teapot or, perhaps more aptly, a maelstrom in an aquarium. The topic of discussion in such cases is, for good reasons, less frequently the effects of the current system than the possible effects of a change which has been proposed for one reason or another, and such trouble-borrowing is unnecessary as well as unprofitable, for when changing circumstances lead to a change in a social system it is invariably found that the young of the flock adjust themselves with a surprising rapidity to the new conditions, in spite of the fluttcrings of the anxious few among them and the cluckings of their elders.

Costs Same To Support Convict As College Boy

Albany — it costs New York State as much to keep a man in prison as it costs a father to send his son to college, according to calculations of Bernard J. Fagan, state parole commissioner.

Here today on his way to a meeting of the parole board at Great Meadow prison, Commissioner Fagan said:

"Prisons now cost $4,000 per cell to construct, and it costs the state $500 a year to keep a man in prison who should be out working to support his family. Yet it costs only $75 a year to supervise him when he is out.

"There are 7,000 convicts in prison and 7,000 out on parole. If we could devise some plan to keep the right men in jail and let the right men out, there would be a great economic saving to the state."

Students Don't Neck

Syracuse, N.Y.—University students don't neck, they snuggle, according to J. C. Cooper, driver for a Syracuse cut rate taxicab company. For more than eight years he has piloted students about the city, and students don't neck any more than anyone else, he says.

"We find the student traffic quite a large part of our business," Cooper told an interviewer. "In the summer we miss it a great deal."

Student tips are low, the driver said and the taxi men don't depend on them a great deal.

Useful Bacteria

In a narrow frigid vault in the Connaught Laboratories of the University of Toronto, held in sealed glass jars and phials, are millions upon millions of germs, agents of diphtheria, scarlet fever, small pox, lock-jaw, meningitis, and other pernicious plagues that beset man kind. Tiny organisms, invisible to the naked eye, yet their presence and activity is grimly apparent. For on the surface of the devil's broth in which they thrive and multiply, floats their creation, that while phlegm-like muck which is concentrated death. Fascinating to look upon yet shiverishly repellent, it turns the imagination upon a vista of horror.

These bacteria have a purpose, which is practical, definite and dramatic. They are there to war against their own kind, a vanguard forces in the everlasting struggle against dreaded diseases of which they themselves are carriers.

Talk of strategy, there is nothing in the annals of the armies to compare with the cunning and resource of the modern preventative medicine.

It is an institution founded nineteen years ago in a converted stable for the sole purpose of serving as an outpost in humanity's battle with death: organized to protect human life and guard the children of this Dominion, the tots and youngsters of to-day and generations of them yet unborn.

The Connaught Laboratories have grown through the intervening years to a nationally recognized centre of warfare against scourages which centuries past have pestered and taken such heavy toll of life. To-day it proudly takes place beside such famous seats of research as the Pasteur Institute of Paris and the Lister Institute of London. The original quarters have evolved into an imposing structure. The entire complicated yet smoothly working organization comprising of more than one hundred and fifty individuals—scientists, research specialists, technicians and trained assistants of both sexes, is under the direction of the founder, Professor J. G. Fitzgerald.

Through his work and that of his assistants the average expection of life in Canada has been lengthened, infant mortality decreased and death rates are lower where public health authorities have been allowed full sway in the use of these universally endorsed Connaught products.

Sixteen different serums, vaccines and anti-toxins as well as Banting-Best insulin treatment and Minot liver specific for pernicious anaemia are under process of constant production. Raw materials are obtained from the blood of horses, calves and sheep shipped in special containers to the main laboratories, and there with endless caution and pains it is reduced, purified, filtered, tested and retested, diluted and packed for shipment.

And there is no notion of profit whatever. The Connaught Laboratories and their seventy-five acre farm, a short distance from Toronto, are entirely a public service institution, amply endowed by the Government and university appropriations and other sources of largesse.

Thousands of children, who in 1913 would have died from diphtheria, scarlet fever, and other such dire scourages are today being saved to live and play, to realize the fond hopes of their parents, to grow to adolescense, to manhood and womanhood, their young vulnerable blood strengthened and reinforced by elements that defy and defeat the attacks of venomous carriers.

It was diphtheria that was uppermost in Fitzgerold's mind. It is a malady prone to attack the children of the poor families, those least able to pay for treatments then imported and those most susceptible to invasion. He approached the university authorities with his plan of attack to which they readily acquiesced for he was not hitting in the dark because the free use of anti-serum in New York reduced the death rate of diphtheria from 99 per thousand in 1894 to 20 in 1913. Since its introduction to the Dominion the results have been as miraculous.

Most of the sera are supplied by the Department of Health free of charge and those that are not, are supplied at cost. So there is no reason why they should not be utilized to the mutual benefit of the Ontario public resulting in the complete extermination of such diseases as diphtheria and scarlet fever.

It has been the case except where doubt ignorance and prejudice have held up the waves of scientific attack.

Publishers Preparing To Issue Monthly Jag

"The publishers of the Monthly Jag are hard at work," said the Editor of the Jag, when interviewed this morning. "We found that by waiting a few days longer we could obtain some added attractions for our readers and as our aim is to give our public the best possible Jag for a dime, we did not hesitate to postpone publication."

Asked when the Jag would appear on the campus the Editor replied that it depended on when the cuts, which are being made by an expert cartoonist, are available. "We have some excellent cartoons which should add pep to the Jag," he added.

Questioned regarding the amount of copy received the Editor replied that a fair amount of material had been submitted and that some of it was exceptionally good. "However, embryo humorists can still submit humorous poems and articles for three or four days," he stated. "We are going to hold the forms open for a short time."

You never realize how fortunate you are until you enter a gift shop and see how many things your friends haven't sent you.

Gissing Pictures On Exhibit In Red Room

Those who know and love the west should find a particular appeal in the pictures by Roland Gissing which are at present hung in the Red Room. Gissing lives at Cochrane, Alberta, where he settled some years ago, partly because he thought that there was more sky in the prairies than anywhere else in the world. For as you will realize when you have seen some of his work, his chief interest lies in sky-studies. His work is characterized by the bold, brilliant colouring of the Ontario Society of Artists, but there is in it a depth of tone and a softness all his own. "The West Wind", perhaps not typical of Gissing's art, is a fresh, windswept composition, in which a solitary pine leans across the foreground, and a brilliant curve of greenish-blue sky gives light to the background behind a line of hills and a strip of ruffled water. "Chinook at Sunset" is one of the sky-studies in which Gissing delights. The lucid sky and heavy clouds are balanced by a foreground of desolate wasteland and dead jack-pine, and the whole impression received is one of sinister power, contrasting curiously with the clear gaiety of the other composition.

These pictures are being exhibited here with the idea that someone may perhaps feel that they would be desirable possessions. Some day they may be worth far more than the artist asks for them now.

Art Exhibit Now On View In Room 111 In Library

The Art Exhibit now on display in Room 111 of Douglas Library has been assembled and circulated by the College Art Association, and is composed of oils, water-colors and lithographs, featuring the modernistic manner. Some outstanding work is being shown by such men as Pierre Revoire and Redon. The exhibition has been made possible through the generosity of the Carnegie Foundation and will be on view for a few days.

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY—Hereafter students' photographs will be as necessary as notebooks in Professor Brownell's class. The professor can not remember names, but by looking at the pictures in the notebooks he will be able to tell who's who.

No official excuses for cuts are now required at the University of Kansas.

"Christian Marriage" Topic of Conference

Dr. Ernest Thomas in a recent S. C. M. discussion, brought before the group the problem "Christian Marriage and Before." In his speech Dr. Thomas stressed the importance of placing marriage on a plane above that of biological need and deplored the recent tendency of modern novelists to stress this side of marriage. The essential meaning of Christian marriage is not to pull God down to the level of biology, but to raise marriage to the level of a Sacrament.

Dr. Thomas quoted Havelock Ellis as giving two conceptions of marriage, the Catholic view, which considers marriage as a sacred and lasting union, and the Protestant view which makes marriage a contract for the exchange of sexual privileges.

"The adoption of Christ's attitude to marriage would cause the problem of divorce almost to vanish, for under the conviction, shared by both parties, that "incompatibility" could be and must overcome by sympathy, patience and self-discipline, minor strains would not develop into disruption" concluded Dr. Thomas.

Ghost Writers Earn Money Writing Students' Essays

That bugbear of freshman, English composition, is not the dread it once was. Any student with an inclination for writing can earn easily his "pin" money by writing themes for freshmen. Of course, however, he must understand the "ropes" of the trade.

One student on the campus who makes theme writing his avocation explains the racket. "I have a representative at each house to do my soliciting," he said. "It's a good idea to get the freshman adviser, as he knows who's funking."

This professional theme writer has set his price scale according to the professor's mark. For example, an "A" is worth a dollar; a "B", 75 cents, and a "C," 50 cents.

Touches Up Autobiographies

"Freshman autobiographies are especially good material for the theme writer," he said, "The freshman tells me the story of his life. I use this as the framework of the story and touch it up as I see best."

In addition to ability in writing, a knowledge of the tastes of the different instructors in freshman composition is a necessary asset of a good theme writer, he said. And then, he added, to make a success of the profession, one must study the personality of the freshman.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Dear Mr. Editor:

Compliments and congratulations of all sizes to the Arts '35 Dance Committee! Something new and virtually different was the order of the evening on February 14th. Many conjestures had been made in regard to this affair by all members of the Year and by "outsiders," all of which were wrong!

We are composing this letter on our own initiative because we feel that the Committee has accomplished something for which they deserve a great deal of credit. The Ycar Dance not only paid, but was such a howling success that "an enjoyable time was had by all."

Arts '35 will always be known as the Year with nautical tendencies and the Moonlight Excursion to Clayton in September, 1931, will be forever perpetuated in the Einsteinian space-time continuum. Posterity will gasp with awe on hearing of those intrepid adventurers who braved the wrath of the gods, returning with the spoils of conquest only to be forced to do battle with the Knights of the Searing Shears. They returned, they conquered!

La Carte de Soir, an orchestra of midshipmen, a ship's bell and other details combined to make the orgy of St. Valentine a memorable event. Our patrons and patronesses were the best ever. Mr. Ted Hughes and his enterprising committee are to be congratulated! May they in future incarnations devote their entire time to organizing dances for misguided angels!

Ever thine,
Four Members of Arts '35

The Theatre

AT THE CAPITOL

THE FLAG LIEUTENANT
with
Henry Edwards and Anna Wagle.

Canadian moviegoers are fortunate that the series of British pictures at the local theatres is being continued. The Flag Lieutenant, although not of the calibre of other pictures seen here, is on the whole well done. The atmosphere of the British Navy gives something to the picture which no synthetic Hollywood naval background could produce. This is the result of the co-operation of the Admiralty Office, and the picture company, and by the fact that Henry Edwards the featured star was also the director of the picture.

The spontaneity of Edwards as Dicky Lascelles was one of the delightful features of the picture, and the natural vivacity of the blonde English star, Anna Wagle was a change from the forced gaiety of American films. The dramatic attempts made by brunette Mrs. Cameron failed to make the deserved impression.

Another, undesirable inpression left by the picture was that given by the clothes. Granted that it would take either brilliant creations or well-designed simplicity to offset the trappings of the naval uniforms, the British-designed clothes of the feminine stars did not compare with the profusion of gilt and gold braid of the uniforms. B+.

AT THE TIVOLI

CENTRAL PARK
With Joan Blondell, Wallace Ford, Guy Kibbee, Henry B. Walthall and others

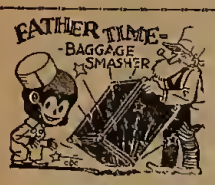
Central Park is merely one situation piled onto another, with fine disregard for continuity. Seeing this film is very much like being present at a pyrotechnic display. After the flare and the noise are over what then? And if, actually, I would prefer the fireworks to the film, I confess the flare and noise and subsequent vacuum are equally present in both.

Fancy an escaped lunatic, a keeper mauled by a lion whose pride has been hurt, a holdup, a wreck, and one fight on the heels of another—these are merely a few of the minor contretemps which disturb the peace of Central Park. The Park would certainly seem to be a panacea for dullness, if a stringent one. Plenty of yeast here to act upon the sluggish tempo.

And there is a lion who is awfully good in his way. No self-seeking star should ever consent to an animal in the supporting cast; they have a fatal habit of walking off with the show. C plus.

Announce Competition Of New Laminated X-Ray Tube

The completion of a new X-ray tube made of laminated paper in Palmer Laboratory recently, was announced recently in the regular issue of the American Institute of Physics.



Constructed as one of the experiments to develop X-ray tubes for the 10,000,000 volt Van de Graff electricity generator, which is nearing completion at the M. I. T. research station, it has withstood 3000,000 volts, while all existent glass tubes have broken at 40,000 volts. It is cylindrical in shape, about one-quarter inch thick, approximately four feet long and nearly seven inches in diameter. Brass plates are fastened to the ends, while the laminated paper has been impregnated with shellac.

Book Chats

By R.M.

How many really literate people care a fig about beautiful books except as decorations for the mantel piece or library table? Very often, however, plebian little volumes, dog-eared and soiled with handling, are more dearly prized than expensive tomes. Then again, there are few genuine book-lovers who are in a position to pay from fifteen to five hundred dollars (sometimes more) for one book. But why should literary masterpieces, containing the precious life blood of great spirits, have to be read from soiled yellowed pages, any more than a Beethoven symphony should have to be played from a tattered score?

This thought brings to mind the Limited Editions Club of New York which undertakes to distribute twelve hand-designed classics per annum to its members. Covers, illustrations, and type design are all the work of individual craftsmen, who, despite the malicious competition of cheap books, have achieved eminence in their respective fields. One of the most outstanding men in the craft of type designing today is Frederick William Goudy. To understand the significance of his work one needs a knowledge of the whole history of the development of typographical art.

But of course, it is not feasible to go into a detailed account in a short article. The subject matter is enormous. One would have to start with the invention of block printing in China, 756 A.D. and narrate the stages in the evolution of movable type, metal type and so on ad infinitum. In Europe, printing as an art has been associated with such names as Hollander, Koster, Gutenberg and Aldo Manuzio of Venice. The Aldine Press was the first to use italics; Nicholas Jenson, also of Venice, designed a beautiful roman type in 1470.

William Caxton introduced the art into England in 1476. But the first great English typefounder was William Caslon who died in 1766. A contemporary of his was John Baskerville; another name associated with this period is that of Charles Whittington, founder of the Cheswick Press. Nearer to our own times is William Morris, a wonderfully energetic man, equally distinguished in the nineteenth century for his accomplishments in literature, architecture, painting, and typographical design. William Morris rejuvenated printing in England; William Gondy has done even more for America in the twentieth century.

Now Caslon, Baskerville and Morris thought they had done something remarkable when they invented two new types but Gondy has designed seventy-five type faces to date. Of these the Kennerley model is the most beautiful, unsurpassed since Caslon first began casting in 1724. H. G. Well's book "The Door in the Wall" was printed in this style by the Village Press of Forest Hills, Mass., some years ago and it is still the most elegant example of printing craftsmanship. In 1916 Mr. Gondy sold eight new faces to the Caslon foundry, England, and since then he work has been in demand. He has done a font for the Women's Home Companion while a large part of the advertising layout in "The Saturday Evening Post" shows the influence of William Goudy's ideas.

Mr. Goudy regards his craft as an art in every sense of the term and makes painstaking studies of the early masters resulting in such unique type styles as the Trajan Tile which finds its prototype in the Trajan column at Rome. He has received the Gold Medal of the American Institute of Graphic Arts and the Freedsam Gold Medal of the Architectural league of New York. At present he resides near his shop at Marlborough, New York.

MUSIC

A most enthusiastic meeting of the Music Club was held last Thursday. First Brahms' Symphony was played, then the Moonlight Sonata, but after that the customary order and restraint went all to pieces. The Secretary put his magnificent collection of records at the disposal of the club. The program continued with a Chopin Prelude, Frankie and Johnnie, the Quartet from Rigolette and another quartet "When the Roll is Called up Yonder." Few of those who heard the remarkable euphonium solo in the last composition will ever forget it.

The meeting ended with the playing of that popular jazz number. "St. Louis Blues."

In One Ear

By Outis

From reports Miss Wilhelmina Gordon is still cracking wise about the Journal.

* * * *

Her latest remarks about headlines were really amusing, despite the fact that she knows nothing about headline writing.

* * * *

For her information "Outis" wishes to remind her that headline writing is one of the most difficult tasks in turning out a newspaper. It requires extreme patience, and expert headliue writers become top-notchers only after years of experience.

* * * *

I am sure that the Journal headline writers would be glad to have Miss Gordon down at the publishers on the next Journal day, or any other publication day.

* * * *

We might even arrange with the printers to have tea served about 5 o'clock.

* * * *

This department unhesistatingly recommends for oblivion the Shower Room quartet heard every afternoon, and led by Bill Glass.

* * * *

Two music lovers who happened to be at the pool on the occasion of one of their uncalled for effusions nearly drowned themselves.

* * * *

Latest rumours concerning "The Monthly Jag" are to the effect that it will be a "wow" of a publication.

* * * *

The Editors leave to-day for an unknown destination.

* * * *

It is believed that the purpose of the visit is to have a few cartoons made by a prominent cartoonist.

* * * *

Mr. Havelock Robb feels that he has been slighted by the University for not arranging an interview with Masefield for him.

* * * *

Who is Mr. Robb?

The Kingston Mail had bad luck with their Masefield lecture story.

* * * *

We quote from the Mail:

"Here and there he wandered: Of course, 'The West Wind,' with his lark singing above the green wheat; 'Right Royal,' telling of blown steeds and fallen horsemen: 'The Daffodil Fields' and 'The Everlasting Mercy!' the 'Dauher' and much from 'Salt Water Ballads!' 'Gallipoli,' of forlorn hopes."

* * * *

As a matter of fact he only read from one of these works.

This review, dear readers, was written before the lecture had taken place.

"Outis" throws out the friendly advice that such ridiculous stories do not help the paper.

* * * *

We can now definitely announce that the Oxford Group will not come to Kingston.

* * * *

There are not enough rooms in the La Salle Hotel.

* * * *

We learn that "Jesus" will take the part Ferrovius in the coming Dramatic Guild production "Androcles and the Lion".

Worms turn up in the funniest places. A certain student paleontologist can vouch for this.

QUEEN'S TAKES BUT TWO VICTORIES

Toronto Fighters Win Annual Intercollegiate Assault At Montreal With Nine Victories

fight. He made a mistake right there, because although in the first round he hit Carr with everything but the water bucket he could not stop him. Carr came back in the 2nd, taking more and more punishment, but handing out a lot himself. In the 3rd with his face covered with blood, his knees buckling, and practically out on his feet he punched McLennan all over the ring, landing hard rights and lefts to the jaw, staggering his opponent and winning the admiration of all. For minutes after he left the ring the crowd applauded his display.

Another reason why Queen's stole the show was the out-standing effort of Jimmy Peters, another newcomer, against J. Gilbert of McGill, reputed light-heavy weight champ. of the Pacific coast. It was superb, no mere written word can tell it. Only those who were fortunate enough to see it can realize what a great battle this boy Peters put up against Gilbert who had K.O'd the Varsity man the night before in one round. After taking a terrific beating in the first round and part of the second Peters came back to battle his opponent to a close knockout in the 3rd. A little more experience would have secured a K.O. for Peters over Gilbert. It was a great fight and will be talked about at McGill for many a day.

I only pick the above men as examples of what the whole team did. They may have been beaten, but they were never out gamed. With another year's experience the same team will bring home the bacon. That is not a personal view, but is the concensus of opinion at McGill and Varsity.

And what about the fencers? McGill won the team championship, and also the individual honors, which were won by Wiggers of the Red team. He won all 6 bouts, but was hard pressed to secure a win from Harris of Queen's, who led the champ. up to the last point. A lot of credit is coming to Harris who won 3 bouts, one of them being over Moll of Varsity, last year's champ. The bouts he lost were close and with more experience he should make things interesting for all comers next year. Nunn and Hyslop did well against more experienced men and will have to be reckoned with in future tournaments.

The results of the Queen's team were as follows:—

BOXING

118 lbs.—McGill lost a close decision to Rapsey of Toronto in the finals. This was one of the outstanding battles of the meet.

126 lbs. Mitchell was going like a house on fire against Fyshe of McGill until a wild swing caught him on the jaw. From then on he was groggy and the fight was stopped in the 2nd round.

135 lbs.—Ran MacDonald fought like a champ., beating McGregor of McGill for two rounds and flooring him twice for counts. McGregor was given the decision much to his and everyone else's surprise.

145 lbs.—Peever ran into unexpected opposition in Sinclair of Varsity on the 1st night, and it took the champ. two rounds to solve his style, and K.O. his man in the 3rd. In his appearance the 2nd night against Swift of McGill it was the usual Peever fight, a K.O. in the 1st round.

155 lbs.—Woolgar fought Greene of Varsity, battling him all the way. "Chuck" got a fast clip which dazed him, and he decided to take a count of 9. He was just getting to his feet to continue on when the referee held up his opponent's hand. The timers protested that the ref. had cut the count short, nevertheless his decision held. It was tough on "Chuck" as the judges' [illegible] him to be out in front until this happened.

165 lbs.—Carr lost a very close decision to McLennan in one of the best events of the assault.

175 lbs.—Peters came mighty close to dethroning a champion when he fought Gilbert in the finals. In the last round he needed only one good punch to put his man away, but he had given all he had.

Heavyweight—Code had a big heart to go into the ring with the famous Maughan of McGill who outweighed him by 35 lbs. He fought a game fight, but Maughan's superior strength and experience secured him a technicial K.O.

WRESTLERS

With few exceptions all the wrestlers were the victims of the famous "Varsity ride." It did not give the team a chance to show their stuff. At straight wrestling they have nothing to fear from any amateurs, but against such tactics they were lost as were the McGill wrestlers.

118 lbs. May wrestled E. Dick of Varsity the first night. He turned in a fine brand of mat work. He was the aggressor from the first gong and threw his man twice in 4 minutes, thus qualifying for the finals.

In the finals he met D. Belli of McGill. He carried the battle to his opponent all the way and at the end of the two rounds he looked a sure winner. But he was the victim of what looked like a queer decision, and was forced to go into overtime. When the period was over the bout was given to Belli. It was tough on May who fought two great fights to be beaten on what many called a home-town decision.

126 lbs.—Forsberg, the first night, took on Lapin of McGill. For the first period Lapin managed to keep the Queen's man from pinning his shoulders to the mat. However Forsberg must have been well coached in the rest period for he went right after his man in the second, getting the first fall in two minutes and getting a second 1 minute later.

Johnstone of Varsity was his opponent in the finals and Fuzzy was just as aggressive as he was the night before, but like the most of the other wrestlers he fell a victim of the "Varsity Ride" and had to submit to having his face ground into the mat, etc. He lost the decision. However he is picked by both the other colleges to win next year, and as the outstanding wrestler on the Queen's team this year.

135 lbs.—Jimmy Campbell on the opening night met Miller of Varsity. Jimmy carried the fight all the way, trying to secure a fall. Miller wrestled defensively throughout the bout. So that it was a shock to everyone when the judges called for overtime. In the overtime Campbell attempted to get a fall in the first minute and became another victim of the ride plus all the little extras such as having an elbow draw across his face, a chin driven into his back, his face shoved into the mat, etc. In this way Jimmy lost his decision. On good authority we have it that the second round of the fight was judged on a wrong basis as shown by the ballots and that is that.

145 lbs.—Johnson making his first appearance in the final put up a great argument against Fletcher of Varsity, who is a veteran at the game. Time and again the Varsity man tried for his favourite hold, but the Queen's man was too shifty for him and kept squirming out. After two minutes when they had not gone to the mat the referee stopped the bout and tossed for positions. Johnson elected to go on the mat for the ride. In the second round it was nip and tuck, the Varsity man nosing out the decision.

155 lbs.—M. Bews met Dimitrieff of Toronto in the finals. There was real action in this bout from the first. Bews knows his wrestling and against an opponent who would wrestle with him he could put up a smart battle. As was the case with the other men he went out after a fall thus taking chances. The Varsity man once again got on top and for the "umpteenth" time the audience was treated to an exhibition of riding that would have made "Paul Revere" sell his horse to a glue factory. The Toronto man got the decision.

165 lbs.—Carlyle fought in the finals against Shute of Toronto. Elsewhere I have told you of the great pluckiness Carlyle showed. Even after being knocked out Carlyle came back to make it a toss up as to just who would get the judges' decision. Carlyle will win next year.

175 lbs.—H. Hosking went right out and took two falls from MacLean of McGill in 45 seconds, and that put him into the finals. The following night he was teamed up with Watt of Toronto. Henry, benefitting by the experience of the others wrestled an entirely different type of bout the second night. He out-foxed the fox and played a waiting game. He coaxed his man along till he got him where he wanted him, did a quick reverse and put Watt underneath. The audience enjoyed this very much and were equally glad when he received a well-earned decision to make him four time intercollegiate champion at 175 lbs. This is Hoskings' last appearance for Queen's as he graduates this year, having completed four years without a recognized defeat, a credit to his coach, to wrestling, to his college and himself.

Heavyweight—L. Roberts ran into a hard man in Gray of Varsity, the present intercollegiate champ. for the 2nd time. Roberts was outweighed and out-classed by a more experienced opponent. Grey won by two falls in the first round.

The above review may in the opinion of some be harsh in parts and even unfair or unsportsmanlike, but I have written if in the hope that it will correct some of the existing faults. It is my hope that it will cause some definite action to be taken and this is also the hope of every man who made the trip.

Tricolor Moves Up By Beating Quakers

Queen's Juniors eliminated Peterborough from the O.H.A. race at the Harty Arena last night by defeating the Quakers 5-2, taking the round 9-4. The game was somewhat tame for two periods during which the Tricolor scored all their goals but in the final frame Peterborough made it interesting all the way and tallied twice.

The line-up was the same as in the first game except that McQuaig replaced Corrigan on Queen's relief forward line.

Queen's started with the opening gong and after five minutes play Lewis scored on a hot drive from right wing. When Queen's were penalized the Petes tried hard but James turned them back. With five minutes to go McQuaig tallied the second Tricolor marker, and fifteen seconds later Wing passed to Lewis who again drove the disc home.

In the second period Queen's notched two more, the first on a lone dash by Wing, and the second by Lewis after a nice combination effort. James made a couple of marvelous saves about the half way mark.

Peterborough came to life with a vengeance in the final period and scored two goals, both by McGregor, fast skating right wing. The Petes swarmed around James who once more saved sensationally.

The victory over Peterborough places the Tricolor in the third round play-downs, meeting Oshawa or Newmarket, the first game being on Friday evening of this week.

SPORTS SLANTS

The hard fighting puck chasing Juniors are in their stride and Wally Elmer fears no team. The boys play very well together and unselfishness in passing the puck is one big reason for their success.

* * * * *

Tricolor fans could hardly credit the early report from Montreal that Queen's only won two events. A much better showing was looked for in view of the successes against other clubs. Coaches Bews and Jarvis should not feel down-hearted about the results.

* * * * *

The Senior basketball team is still in the running for top honors though their path is rocky. They will have to win right in McGill next Saturday to retain their chances.

* * * * *

If the Senior "B" team turns in the game it is capable of, it should register a win in Ottawa to-night. Many fans firmly believe that the team has yet to show its real ability and to-night's the night.

Juniors Overcome Peterborough Squad

Initiating a furious first period drive Queen's Junior O.H.A. team literally swept Peterborough Quakers off their feet and burying them under an avalanche of flying pucks captured the first game of the second round play downs 4-2 at the Liftlock City last Friday night. The Tricolor's prompt offensive had the homesters badly disorganized and it was well into the final frame before they became dangerous and by this time the Collegians had piled up a commanding lead. It was Queen's best game to date and though the Petes presented a husky and fast skating sextet they were clearly outplayed and only when staring humilating defeat in the face did they rally sufficiently to make it close.

It would be hardly fair to pick any Tricolor stars but if one were tabulating observations a la Charlie Querrie it would be necessary to give one star each to James in goal, Gibson, Smith and Pettit on defence and the remaining one split up among the forwards. James again gave a stellar display of net tending and while he was not extended during the first two frames the Petes bombarded him from all angles and with all kinds of shots during the hectic last period.

In scoring three or his team's goals "Al" Lewis proved himself a fine marksman while his speed and back checking were other features. "Johnny" Wing's great play-making again stood out in the Tricolor attack, his wide pass to Lewis after pulling the Peterboro defence over giving the right winger a great opening for Queen's. second goal. "Vinny" Corrigan proved a constant worry to the Petes and only hard luck prevented the "mighty atom" from scoring at least two goals. Bryden notched Queen's first marker and was a threat all the way while Christie and Bain also contributed their share to the Tricolor victory.

The game was comparatively clean, seven penalties in all being inflicted by Referee Bert Clayton of Toronto and strange as it may seem the visitors drew all seven. Also believe it or not there were a couple of Queen's yells given during the game by a few faithful who reached Peterborough by devions routes. One is forced to note the absence of the "War Cry" in home games and hope the same faithful will be on hand for future games here and that their fine example will stir the student body from the lethargy which seems to settle over the Arena every time a Queen's hockey team is in action.

Apparently Peterborough feared the Tricolor as their greatest pre-game ballyhoo hope was to "eke out a narrow victory," according to a story in the "Examiner". Cadd on defence. Calladine at centre and Jay on left wing turned in the best efforts for the home team though McGregor and Burley were conspicuous at all times and Sanderson in goal made many clever saves.

It was several minutes before the "Elmermen" became accustomed to the small rink and natural ice but before long they were travelling at top speed. There were numerous close calls on the Peterborough cage but ten minutes had elapsed before Bryden notchel the first goal from a scramble. Three minutes later Wing passed to Lewis and the blonde wing made no mistake pulling Sanderson out to hit the empty net. He scored number three shortly later by blazing a hot drive from the blue line into the upper corner.

At the opening of the second period both Queen's defence players were penalized almost simultaneously but with all the determination of Horatius at the Bridge the remaining Tricolor defenders successfully staved off the eager Quakers. After twelve minutes of play Lewis scored his third goal of the night on a pass from Smith. During the balance of the period there were numerous close calls at the Peterborough net and occasionally James was tested at the opposite end.

Facing a four goal deficit starting the last chapter and spurred in by a somewhat disgruntled home town crowd the Petes became frantic and turning loose their best offensive of the night hemmed the Collegians in their end of the rink and started peppering James from all sides. Finally the puck was kicked into the net but play was called back. After six and a half minutes Burley scored for Peterborough after picking up the disc at least eight feet off-side.

Following the face off James was kept busy for a time and cleared various shots from long and short range. The Tricolor suffered from penalties and the homesters notched their second counter on a rink length rush by Cadd. After this goal Queen's retrenched and were successful in retaining the two goal margin.

Line-up:

Peterborough		Queen's
Sanderson	Goal	James
Cadd	Defence	Gibson
Weir		Smith
Calladine	Centre	Wing
Jay	Wings	Bain
McGregor		Lewis

Junior Cagers Beat Napanee

The Junior Basketball team came through in great fashion in the opener on Friday night, taking a hard fought victory from the highly touted Napanee outfit by the score of 17-14. The game was fast and clean. The Juniors have improved immensely and are showing up better each time out.

Bill Simmons was the star of the game. His offensive work was a feature as well as his close checking. He was capably assisted by Wateer and McDiarmid, Henley and Stephens played a steady game on defence and were constant threats at all times.

Crawford, Cohen, Rodger and Gertsman, also showed up well.

The Juniors still have a chance to cop the title and are going to make every effort to do so. They still have three games to play and are confident of them all. On Wednesday night they play R.M.C. and a win is expected.

SCIENCE DOESN'T WAIT —

Berkeley, Calif—No longer do expectant fathers need to wait anxiously for the nurse to inform them whether it is a boy or a girl, according to two University of California scientists. Successful experiments with a new method of prenatal determination of the sex of children were announced today by Dr. John N. Dorn and Edward L. Sugarman, chemist. The experiment succeeded in 90 per cent. of the cases, they said.

Tricolor Basketeers Second In League

The curtain was pulled down on Senior Intercollegiate basketball here on Friday night when Jack Finley's Senior squad took Western into camp for the second time this year by an overwhelming victory, the final score being 45-30. The Tricolor were superior most of the way and had no difficulty pulling through with a win. The victory puts Queen's in second place in the league. Western were away off color and did not have the speed or dash displayed here two weeks ago by McGill. They appeared stale and roamed all over the floor, and except for Chermiak, their star guard, seldom attempted anything that looked like team play.

The flashy dribbling and passing of the Tricolor squad pleased the crowd immensely. They scored early and at half time had piled up a 15 point lead, the score being 25-10. During this first half, with the Tricolor boasting a fair lead, Howie Carter came on for McLaughlin and gave the fans something to look at when he immediately scored three sensational baskets. He tore in the minute he came on and backhanded a beautiful shot that dropped neatly into the basket. Right after that he went in for two more, the fans giving the rugby star a big hand for his fine work.

Backed up by McLaughlin, who was right in his element, Capt. Donny Bews played his usual heady game on defence. Both men were constant threats offensively, while their persistent back checking was at all times most effective.

Wilf Newman was the star of the game. His accurate shooting was the outstanding feature of the night. All told he ran in 16 points for the Tricolor. In the second half he battered his way through the Western team to score four brilliant baskets and a couple of free throws.

Ted Hallett seems to be getting better each time out. He and McMahon combined beautifully on the forward line to work in some pretty combination play. The latter seemed to have an off night on his shots, several of them just missing the hoop by inches.

Chermiak was the main stay for Western. Without him Queen's would have piled up a much higher score. He and Hayter kept the Westerners in the swim. Both scored 10 points each.

The game was Queen's from the start. The Tricolor set a fast pace and lost no time in running up a good sized lead. For sustained speed and action the game was unrivalled. Newman, Carter, McLaughlin and Bews kept the Westerners on the jump during the first half. In the second half Newman ran wild, aiding the Tricolor in maintaining their 15 point lead when the game was over.

The teams:

Queen's—Forwards, McMahon, Hallett (7); Centre, Newman (16); Guards, McLaughlin (6), Bews (7); Spares, Rooke (2), Carter (6), Brown.

Western—Forwards, Whitehill (6), Hayter (10); Centre, Hogan (2); Guards, Zavits, Chermiak (10); Spares, Gunn (2), Clarke.

Referee—Percy Miller.

Sports Views

The B. W. & F. team came a woeful cropper in the final tests in Montreal on Saturday, but they all tried hard. Peever and Hoskings supplied the thrills of the night by putting away their men handily. According to some the Varsity wrestlers can be referred to as the fall-less wonders, for they got most of their decisions on points. Queen's men had plenty of falls to their credit but few decisions. It's a tough world.

Coach Jack Jarvis was naturally disappointed in the results of the B. W. F. meet. He can rest assured, however, that his work here has been of the highest order, and that everyone will look forward to his return next year.

Should the Tricolor Juniors dispose of Peterboro, as they are expected to do, they will face real opposition in the next round for they are drawn against the winner of the Oshawa-Newmarket series. As Newmarket won the first game 4 goals to nothing, Queen's will likely be playing in that town on Friday evening of this week, with the return game on Monday. More will be revealed in Friday's issue.

The Junior and Intermediate basketball teams applied plenty of power and skill on Friday evening to defeat the two Napanee squads. Pete Lewis appears to be guiding his Intermediates in the right direction, to a championship, but Joe "Schnozzle" Josephson must keep after his Juniors if they intend to get into the playoff.

Both teams see action tomorrow evening against R. M. C. quintettes and a couple of wins are looked for.

Queen's Senior "B" hockey team plays tonight in Ottawa with the University of that town. Queen's must win all their remaining games in order to retain a chance at the title and after some heavy practices the players feel they can take the Capital players.

Following their game with Ottawa, they have a game with R. M.C. here on March 1st, which will likely complete the schedule.

The Tricolor Junior hockey team has been improving with every game and has made many friends. Folks who did not think they stood a snowball's opportunity, now declare just as emphatically that they are a mighty smart team. They played cautiously at Peterborough last Friday to take the verdict.

Basketball attracted a large crowd to the gym Friday and saw a perfectly functioning Queen's team defeat the purple clad Mustangs. Queen's were always better and could have added to their score if pressed.

McGill are in the driver's seat as far as honors are concerned and it will be hard to dislodge them. If Toronto Varsity can take one game from them in the latter town, the Tricolor can take another right in Montreal.

An illustration of the breaks Toronto teams get was revealed in connection with junior hockey playoffs. The U. T. S. junior team was considered quite good up around Yonge Street, and when they were declared group winners, the O. H. A. squinted around for a suitable playoff team. They decided on Newmarket, much to the disgust of the Toronto moguls who squawked loud and long that such a series would mean finis for their juniors, Newmarket being favored by many to win the championship. Their yelps bore bruit and Oshawa juniors were picked as opponents of U. T. S. juniors. The latter team, however, proved to be setups and handed the Toronto outfit a neat lacing to take the round. The moral is that if you whine loudly enough you will get results, that is if you hail from Toronto.

ILLINOIS UNIVERSITY— A penny saved is a penny earned, and it was recently computed by an Associated Press writer that $124,000,000 was saved by research in the university to the citizens of Illinois. Most of the savings came from improvements in materials and savings in crop damage.

Bach Cantata To Be Produced March 7

Bach's Peasant Operetta, presentation of a Queen's Chorus of 45 voices for Tuesday evening, March 7th, is rapidly taking form under the direction of Mrs. H. L. Tracy.

The music of this operetta was written and performed in 1742 as an act of homage to Carl Heinrich von Dieskau, in his becoming 'Lord of the Manor'. The libretto deals with the rejoicing of the villagers and their congratulations and good wishes to the new laird and his wife. This production will be embellished with dancing and orchestral accompaniment.

The director wishes to announce that practices will be held Tuesday and Saturday at five in Ban Righ Hall. The one on Saturday will be a dress rehearsal.

Toronto Girls Win From Queen's Co-eds

In the finals of the Women's Hockey League played at Varsity Arena, the Queen's team lost a closely contested game by the score of 1-0. As this was the score of the previous game in Kingston the trophy goes to the Toronto team for another year. The playing of both teams had improved over the ragged exhibition of hockey presented to the fans in Kingston, and the one goal scored by Varsity was the result of a scramble around the net, when Margot Thompson was successful in pushing the puck in for the counter. The work of the Queen's goalie, Margaret McGregor kept Varsity's lead from increasing. The chances of the teams were even, as the Queen's team was in full strength again, but the players did not work in combination and were lost before the superior team work of the Varsity team.

Outside of the Varsity counter in the first period the play was rather slow. Most of the action was around the Queen's net and the goalie was kept busy. The defence was the highlight of the game and was responsible for the low score.

The second period was a repetition of the first except that penalties weakened both teams and increased the possibility of a score. No advantage was gained and the period remained scoreless.

The third period showed the fastest play of the night and the poor shots of the Queen's wings missed the goal. Queen's were no longer playing a defensive game and more accurate shots would have given them the title.

Line-ups:

Varsity—D. Lumley, J. Atkinson, M. Thompson, E. Sanson, B. Fowler, J. Gow, D. Starr, R. Rous, P. Thompson.

Queen's—M. McGregor, D. Clemens, J. Nelson, J. Stuart, J. Cameron, M. Chambers, C. Milne, A. Mason, R. Cordy, L. Ward.

For this week rehearsals will duplicate previous announcements with the exception of Thursday and Friday when the cast must be on hand at 5 P.M. There will be no rehearsals this afternoon.

Commerce Banquet Slated For Feb. 23

Thursday night at 7.15 sees the second of the large Annual Dinners sponsored by the Commerce Club. It will again be held at the Hotel La Salle, and the management has promised a dinner in keeping with the occasion. Last year no less than 167 people attended this affair, proof that these Commerce banquets have come to be one of the high-lights of our school year.

The executive are endeavoring to make this year's dinner just as great a success. The guest speaker, Mr. J. S. McLean of the Canada Packers, has been described by Dr. Mackintosh as one of Canada's leading business men. His is sure to be most instructive and entertaining and the Commerce Club is proud to be able to introduce such a man to the students of Queen's and the business men of Kingston, the Journal learns.

Other arrangements are being made to ensure the success of this dinner, and those who attend are assured of an evening well spent.

Students could help the committee by purchasing their tickets as soon as possible. These may be obtained from: W. D. Muir, S. Stanyar, C. O'Neill, D. Wade, H. W. Clarkson, S. Whiteford, Ted Hughes and Levana may obtain tickets from Dot Brooks and Helen McNab.

Dr. Harrison Lewis Spoke To Naturalists

Dr. Harrison F. Lewis, Migratory Bird Officer for Ontario and Quebec, was the speaker at Thursday's meeting of the Natural History Club. Dr. Lewis spoke on the Conservation of Birds. Many problems of bird conservation need solving. Some of these are of considerable economic importance. As the example, the eel-grass situation on the Atlantic coast shows the need of detailed study. The eel-grass is the food of Canada Geese, Brant and Black Ducks. Some disease has been attacking and killing the grass and this means starvation for the flocks of geese that winter on the coast. The Department of the Interior is investigating and trying to find a method of control for the disease. In the mean time its progress is being closely watched.

Dr. Lloyd Described African Impressions

"A Naturalist's Impressions of Africa" was the topic of the Extension lecture, delivered in Convocation Hall yesterday by Professor Francis Lloyd of McGill University.

After outlining the course taken in his trip through the continent, Prof. Lloyd traced the various important places in detail. One interesting feature of St. Helena were the peep-holes Napoleon cut in the shutters to see without being seen.

Prof. Lloyd then pointed out that South Africa has a better claim on heather than Scotland as they have over 300 species to Scotland's one or two. Many different types of desert plants that store up water in their leaves and roots were shown.

The speaker did not limit himself to botanical specimens alone, and those shown were extremely interesting. Such plants as "bent-cigarette plants" and "green pebble-plants" proved to be very curiously made up. There are practically no plants in Africa with spines or thorns as there are in the American desert.

One might expect to see many natives in Africa, but Prof. Lloyd stated that in this they were disappointed, although at Johannesburg there was quite a colony of native miners, who after earning $60 would buy three wives and retire. Several species of curly-leafed plants were shown which were designated by the speaker as "spit curl," "marcel" and "finger wave."

The trains in Africa do not get "hot-boxes" as often happens in crossing the American desert. Prof. Lloyd lamented this fact as it prevented him from collecting many rare speciments. The natives of the middle parts of Africa, of the Masai and other tribes show many evidences of having come from Egyptian stock.

Miss Mabel Williams Next Fireside Speaker

The second in the series of Fireside Talks will be given in Ban Righ Hall at seven o'clock on Thursday evening when Miss Mabel B. Williams, free-lance journalist of Ottawa, will speak on "Personality In Publicity". Miss Williams is fully qualified to discuss the various phases of the subject as she has had considerable experience in Journalism. Her specialized branch has been publicity work and she has written extensively for both the magazine and daily press and is well known for her scenario and play writing. In her two booklets "Jasper" and "Jasper Trails". Miss Williams has written some delightful and disguised publicity. To anyone who is interested in Journalism, Miss Williams will be able to bring the practical side of the profession to the round table discussion which will follow the talk.

Up-To-Date X-Ray Apparatus Being Set Up At General Hospital

Improved Unit Being Installed In Douglas Wing By Dr. W. Jones

The Kingston unit of the Ontario Institute of Radiotherapy is rapidly assuming a highly developed form. One half of the lower floor of the Douglas wing in the general hospital is the scene of greatest activity.

Dr. Jones, of the Roentenology department is overlooking the installation of the latest development in X-ray apparatus, a unit produced in Holland and equipped with German-made tubes, to be used for deep therapy treatments. 200,000 volts is its maximum output, as compared with the 140,000 volt capacity of the older equipment. The valve tube rectifier and the transformer circuits are completly shielded and grounded and tube power is carried by insulated and shielded flexible cables. These mechanical refinements, together with the metal casing of the lately developed tubes, ensure a treatment room in which both patient and operator are assured of perfect safety, the whole apparatus being absolutely shock and radiation-proof. A radio might be run in the same room while the tube is being operated, without picking up interference from the X-ray circuits.

An added improvement is the dosimeter connected with the ionization chamber in the radiation path. The dial of this instrument affords the total dosage in (r) units with an occuracy unchanged by fluctuations in line voltage, permitting an exact knowledge of the radiation dose administered. In another room preparations are being made for increased radium treatment facilities.

A number of undergraduates will read poems, short stories and plays of their own composition at a meeting of the English Club next Wednesday afternoon at 4 p.m., Red Room.

Art To Be Subject Of Extension Lecture

Dr. Brown To Speak On National Gallery

The subject of the last extension lecture of the 1932-1933 series, next Monday, will be, "Five Centuries of Art at the National Gallery," and is to be delivered by Dr. Eric Brown,, the director of the National Art Gallery of Canada, at Ottawa. Dr. Brown is outstanding in Canadian art circles and has on several occasions contributed articles on painting, to both British and American magazines.

Born in England, Dr. Brown came to Canada in 109 and has been the director of the National Gallery since 1913. He is a brother of Arnesby Brown, the landscape painter, who has exhibited his work in many countries.

This lecture will not be broadcast, as it is to be illustrated with lantern slides. As a review of a subject of universal interest, it should please even the uninitiated, and it will provide a fitting close to a series of lectures which have been of very high merit, and have aroused a great deal of favourable comment, both inside and outside the University.

Ottawa Conference Results Summed Up

Relations Club Hears Prof. D. A. McArthur

Professor D. A. McArthur gave his personal views of the Ottawa Economic Conference at the regular meeting of the International Relations Club. Beginning with the International aspects he summed them up in two general propositions. First, that the net result should be the increase n volume of world commerce. Secondly, because of its geographic conditions, Canada must continue to be an importing nation and have free access to the world markets. It is not possible for the country to be self-sufficient. These two propositions are fundamental. The speaker then proceeded to set the Conference against the proper historical background, by converging two entirely separate historical processes. That is the economic activities during and after the war, the extensive commercial and industrial increase in production which was greater than the capacity of the world. A threatening process direced France, Spain, Italy and Germany to protect each its own industry against its neighbouring country and the result was higher tariffs especially between France and Germany, and then an effort to keep England on the pound sterling. Preferential tariff started in the days of Joseph Chamberlain and by the end of the last decade tariff protection had developed along the line of the Canadian anti-dumping tariff.

Guild Concentrating On Shaw Comedy

Now that the Dramatic Guild has finished with "Gammer Gurton's Needle," it will be able to devote full time to the production of "Androcles and the Lion," slated for Friday and Saturday evenings, March 10-11th.

At rehearsals Scarth Macdonnell (Androcles), and Hazel O'Kilman (Megnera) his wife, have been going great guns. Hazel as a vitriolic termagant and Scarth, realistically playing the hen-pecked husband, are a ludicious pair to watch. They are bound to bring down the house.

Lavinia's scenes with the Captain have been clicking lately, and no doubt about it. No need to mention, perhaps, that Lebo Ware, talented campus actress, and Arthur Sutherland of March Hares fame, are the personalities behind these roles. Horatio Todd makes a fervent Ferrovious. He will undoubtedly carry the part with distinction.

The other characters, the Centurion, the Lion, Spintho and Metellus are getting into the spirit of the play and reacting well. The Journal will have more information to give in subsequent issues.

Dress Rehearsal For Bach Cantata

A dress rehearsal for the Bach Operetta, sponsored by the Levana Glee Club, under the direction of Mrs. H. L. Tracy, will be held tomorrow afternoon at 2 p.m. The date set for the production, which will be given in Grant Hall, is Tuesday evening, March 7th. An admission charge of 50c and 25c will be made.

The delightful lyrics of this operetta show Bach at his best. And with a good chorus, supplemented by such soloists as Mrs. S. M. Gilmour, Mrs. H. L. Tracy, sopranos; Mr. R. E. Sparks, and Mr. J. A. Percival, tenor and baritone, respectively, a fine presentation is assured.

The chorus will be in costume, assisted by an orchestra and dancing. Miss Murphy is in charge of the latter feature, and Dr. H. L. Tracy will direct the orchestra. This operetta promises to be one of the gala musical treats of the season.

Strong Competition Assured At Montreal

Montreal, Feb. 24 (C.I.P.)—When Queen's determined basketball aggregation steps into the M.H.S. gym Saturday night to lock horns with the high-scoring court machine of coach Van Wagner's McGill squad, they will probably run into plenty of trouble before the evening is over. The 21-18 victory of McGill over Queen's at Kingston, although not a criterion of the Tricolor's best efforts, at the same time should be taken with a good deal of respect, even by the most ardent of Kingston rooters.

If the Redmen were able to take the Queen's courtiers into camp on the latter's own home grounds and after a tedious train ride, they should repeat even more handily this time. However, a roster carrying the names of Bews, Newman and Rooke is one to be feared at any time and another thrilling battle is looked for between the two rival colleges.

The McGill line-up is pretty definite, although George Faulkner is still a doubtful quantity, due to his troublesome knee. Don Young, outstanding pivot man will jump against Newman, flanked by Reel Lawin and possibly Don Smaill. Lewin has been showing sensational form of late, having scored 17 points last week in the game here against Western.

Bob Calhoun and captain Mel Rice are scheduled for rear-guard duty, with Jerry Lee available for defensive relief. This squad is the same one which eked out the 21-18 decision in Kingston.

McGill are at present leading the Intercollegiate league with three wins and no defeats. Queen's are in second position with three wins and two losses.

Queen's And Newmarket Clash At Arena In Junior Playdowns

Tricolor Meets Fast Squad In First Game Of The Third Round

Queen's and Newmarket will clash to-night at the Harty Arena in the first game of round three of the O.H.A. Junior playdowns. In Newmarket the Tricolor meets one of the smartest sextets in the Province and one which is picked by Toronto experts to go a long way in the search for Dominion honors. Ably coached by Bill Hancock the boys from way out Yonge Street made an impressive showing in the S. P.A. series and though ungrouped in the regular season won several exhibition tilts and more recently eliminated Oshawa by a handy margin.

On the other hand the students after playing ordinary hockey in the group fixtures have improved steadily since entereng the play offs and eliminated Belleville and Peterborough without being extended in either series. While they have wholesome respect for the visitors' prowess they are not in the least dismayed by their formidable ballyhoo and will be out there battling every minute for a victory. Coach "Wally" Elmer has taught the locals a lot of hockey and they are now hitting on all six. With "Johnny" Wing making the openings, Al Lewis sniping them in from the right boards and Don James stopping everything but the clock with his spectacular net minding the Tricolor presents three features above the ordinary. There is a possibility that Queen's will trot out a new defence man but the line up will be practically the same as in the last game. This Queen's team has proven to all that it is capable of playing high class hockey and it is to be hoped that the student body will turn out en masse to get behind the team and vocally show its appreciation in no uncertain manner.

Theft At Ban Righ

A fire-extinguisher was stolen from Ban Righ Hall supposedly on Saturday afternoon or evening. The guilty person is not known. The Journal learns that the girls at Ban Righ will be held responsible for its replacement, or the cost of a new one.

The person who now has this fire-extinguisher is asked to return it immediately.

Publishers Promise Readers Good Jag

Student Humorists At Work On Monthly Jag

Work on the Monthly Jag is proceeding apace. Most of the copy is now in the hands of the publishers and is being set up. Negotiations for humorous cartoons and cuts have been completed and the publishers feel sure that they will be able to offer their public something original and new in this line.

A staff of expert Jig Saw fans have been consulted regarding the Jig Saw puzzle which will be printed in the Monthly Jag, and the publishers feel that they can honestly say that the puzzle to be printed in the Jag will be absolutely unique in the history of Jag Saw puzzles. A prize of five dollars is being offered for the first complete Jag Saw puzzle solution handed into the publishers after the new magazine appears on the campus. The first instalment of a glowing, glamorous mystery story by Wadger Ellis for which complete copyrights have been obtained by the publishers of the Jag is the umpteenth work of theis famous author and will make Jag readers sit on the edge of their chairs in jagged suspense.

REGIONAL DRAMA FESTIVAL OPENED HERE LAST NIGHT

The performance of the three plays, "The Stoker," "The Two Mr. Wetherbys", and "Gammer Gurton's Needle", in Convocation Hall last night opened the Regional Drama Festival for Eastern Ontario, and tonight and tomorrow the preliminary trials will be continued for the Dominion Drama Festival to be held in Ottawa in May, under the patronage of His Excellency, the Governor-General.

The Amateur Groups which have entered in the Eastern Ontario section are: Queen's University Dramatic Guild, St. Peter's Players, Brockville, the Belleville Players, Ottawa Drama League, the Faculty Players, Queen's University, Kingston Drama Group, and the Young Thespians, Belleville. In all thirteen different productions are to be staged, for the Ottawa Dramatic League have entered no less than five groups.

Professor J. A. Roy, the convener for Eastern Ontario, is chairman of the General Committee, the other members of which are: Mrs. Thomas Collander, Dr. W. A. Fyfe. W. Rupert Davies, G. G. Fuller, and Miss W. Gordon (Secretary).

Mr. Sterndale Bennett is the Festival adjudicator, and will

EXHIBITION OF MODERN ART NOW IN DOUGLAS LIBRARY

A brilliant exhibition of Contemporary Modern Art consisting of paintings and lithographs of "flower and still life" subjects is now on view in room 111. of the Douglas Library. The exhibition was collected and assembled by the College Art Association and has come to Queen's through the generosity of the Carnegie Corporation.

On entering the room, one is pleased or shocked as the case may be, by the loud colours and curious unrealistic compositions. For example the large picture on the north wall has a bird bath and a vase in the foreground, then a cactus plant, finally ending up with a window in the background. In between are finally ending up with a window in the background. In between are a number of other items criss-crossed in an intricate fashion giving the picture the aspect of a jig saw puzzle,—but such is this type of modern art. Whether it will have a lasting place remains for future generations to decide. Those who like modern art will find the present exhibition well worthy of their consideration for it ranges from several fine "impressionistic" studies to some of the most "ultra" art of the present day. For those who do not like modern art the exhibition is of interest from another viewpoint. There are a number of flow-

The Drama Festival

Widely acclaimed by the press and recognized by the thinking people everywhere as the most meritorious effort of the kind to have been attempted in Canada for countless years, the Dominion Drama Festival comes as a striking example of the faith Canadians place in their country, and in the future.

One or two of the plays which will have been judged as the outstanding offering in this Dominion wide competition will be presented in Ottawa in May. The Festival, it will be remembered, was inaugurated by His Excellency the Governor-General, who has offered a cup for the winning drama group.

Queen's very fortunately for local lovers of good drama has been chosen as the "lieu" for the Eastern Ontario Regional competition of the Dominion Drama Festival. The competition opened in Convocation Hall last night and will continue until Saturday evening inclusively. An excellent opportunity is thus offered for those who are interested in amateur dramatics. Dramatic groups from Ottawa, Belleville, Brockville, Kingston, and Queen's University are taking part in the local competition. Judging by the opening night performances patrons are assured of very interesting offerings.

During the remaining part of this month, and during the month of March similar competitions will be held all over Canada.

Speaking for the Eastern Ontario Competition we would like to stress the fact that a similar competition will surely not be held for some time, and those who miss any of the presentations offered here will not have another opportunity of seeing and enjoying programs of this degree of excellence.

Unfounded Criticism

Much criticism is levelled at college newspapers by thoughtless critics who seek to prove their own intellectual adroitness by finding fault with the work of conscientious undergraduates. These attacks are more a source of humor to the aspiring journalist than anything else. How many people realize the rigid restrictions placed upon themselves by those in charge of undergradnate publications?

Printed news stories often have sensational results but some of the information which is withheld and suppressed by editorial boards would often result in unbelievable repercussions. To the cry that college journalists (and all journalists for that matter) are crude sensationalists, the undergraduate editor can smile. If he began to follow a definite policy of sensationalism he could stir up enough strife in one issue to give his university years an unsavoury publicity. It is fortunate indeed that most editorial boards possess a saving sense of balance.

Few readers realize what a persistent guard is maintained to prevent anything but the truth from being published. Many wild and many reasonable rumours have to be checked and verified because, in spite of what disgruntled persons may say, the newspaper must and does sift out the untruths from the truths. College newspapers frequently incur official censure because certain statements are held to be offensive. Yet do these same authorities realize that no deliberate attempt is being made to antagonize them? Do they realize how much information is suppressed, information which could be used quite easily if the editorial boards desired only to obtain publicity?

The fact remains, that college newspapers do not print anything which is not well-grounded on fact and which vigilant efforts indicate to be untrue. After all, editors do not like to see their universities dragged into the revealing limelight of public criticism.

WITH OTHER EDITORS

The Theatre of the Future

With technocracy, reports on social trends, and other similar topics filling the newspapers and making talk all over the country, it is interesting to contemplate how the new leisure which may come to man might be employed.

The theatre, admittedly one of America's waning institutions and a leisure pastime, comes in for some searching criticism and analysis in January's "New Outlook". No less a personage than Arthur Hopkins, producer and writer, surveys the slowly expiring legitimate stage.

Mr. Hopkins deplores the stark realism of the stage to-day. To quote him:

"We have granted realism such license as the glamorous theatre never knew or wanted. We have been broad-minded to our own discomfort. All conceivable ugly caldrons have been permitted to bubble and boil; all exude their stenches while we caressed our bumps of liberality and fixed our faces in silly masks of tolerance."

But neither does he propose that subjects of everyday life be abandoned. "When the theatre touches everyday life, let it bring some new illumination, some new understanding. Let it deal freely with the mass problems of daily life but in terms that bring light, in terms that bind us closer together. When beauty returns to the theatre, its vitality will cease to ebb."

Hopkins predicts the success of the civic theatre, locally promoted and supported. Worry over box office and hits will no longer cramp the style of playwrights. In their hands will lie the salvation of a "merchanized land, in danger of becoming a citizenry of robots."

Student Snobbery

It is unfortunately true that snobbishness exists in varying degrees among university students on every campus. To be sure, it is found in every walk of life, but to the idealist and also to the unlettered man, who regards a university as a Utopia whence all virtues spring — though this sentiment is becoming rare—such a state of affairs is unharmonious with the broader viewpoint encouraged at these centres of higher education.

There are two varieties of this scourge to be found; there is intellectual snobbishness on the part of those who consider themselves the mental superiors of their fellow undergraduates, and there is the plain, everyday "pass-you-with-a-stony-stare" snobbishness practised by those who consider it effective, or to whom it is unfortunately, natural.

While more education should tend in the natural course of affairs to make the possessor less sure of superiority, this first type is preferable to the latter. The former may, in reality, possess the coin of their particular realm in larger quantity than their fellows, and although it is in poor taste to show a consciousness of this, it is a trifle more justifiable than the snobbishness that is at least the ostensible reason for the presence in communities like ours of every individual; knowledge is the one commodity sought by all, denied to none, available to all who seek it diligently. Thus every student is potenially equal with his fellows. With this in mind, what excuse can possibly be offered for the students who adopt the snobbish attitude for other reasons?

A university should be the nearest approach to an ideal community because of the general similarity in tastes and aims ally equal in age and education, yet which which exist among people who are practic- admits of sufficient variety in individual ideas to stimulate thought. If snobbishness can and does exist in such a community, how much more prevalent will it be in later life when the student finds himself a member of a larger and less ideal community So, in the interests of the better citizenship to which we, as university students, are striving to attain, let us seek before we leave the comparatively sheltered haven of college life to cultivate that spirit of broad-mindedness which does not tolerate snobbery.

College Fashions Change

Diminishing returns in the colleges, or the swing of the pendulum, or the law of compensation, or action and reaction, are reported to have produced no less than two new generations in the course of a few years. Dean Gildersleeve of Barnard College points out that flaming youth in the colleges passed out several years ago. It was followed by blase youth, which in turn passed out about a year ago. The boys and girls today are neither insurrectionary nor indifferent. They now find a meaning in serious and simple things—including themselves.

To produce this result it is obvious that the swing of the pendulum has been reinforced, so to speak, by economic conditions. It was all very well to find no purpose in people or in yourself or in things when there is plenty of money in hand for the purpose of driving away boredom. But when a person is trying desperately hard to persuade some other person to give him a job, he is bound to take both himself and the other person and the job seriously.

Alexander von Humboldt Foundation

The German Consul-General at Montreal invites applications for scholarships of the Alexander von Humboldt foundation. The scholarships afford free tuition at a German university or technical college for one year, and a monthly allowance of 110 Reichsmark (about $32 at the current rate of exchange). It is estimated that an additional sum of $10 to $15 a month will suffice for living expenses.

Applications for the academic session 1933-34 must reach the secretary of the Humboldt foundation not later than March 31st, 1933.

Candidates should possess the following qualifications:

(1) They must have completed their academic studies in their own country and must have an outstanding academic record. Testimonials from the applicant's professors will be required.

(2) They must either have already entered upon a career or else have a definite prospect of securing upon their return from Germany a position which will enable them to assist to an unusual extent in strengthening the intellectual and cultural relations between Germany and their own country.

(3) Their knowledge of the German language must be sufficiently good to enable them to profit by the lectures at a German university and to do research work.

Further information may be obtained from Professor Henel of the German Department or from the German Consul-General direct.

Orals in French

Oral examinations for all students taking French classes numbered 10 or over will be held during the last week of term. The exact date and time will be announced later.

Applications for Degrees

Applications, with fees, for all degrees must be received at the Registrar's Office on or before March 15th.

Prof. McArthur Summed Up Ottawa Conference Results

A scheme of intra-imperial tariffs was put forth. The most significant factor of relations between the Mother Country and her Dominions had to do with the character of the bond. The existence of common loyalty to a single crown and common tradition were the only visible symbols of unity. There was fear of dissolution in England. The substitution for this was a common economic interest, a material structure, in other words a tariff wall surrounding the Empire.

Professor McArthur spoke of the achievements of the Conference from of view of concessions made by Great Britain and those made by Canada. The most important concession made by Great Britain was a 6c per bushel preference on Canadian wheat shipped from Canadian ports or by unbroken shipment from Canada through United States ports. Great Britain introduced the quota arrangement on Australian meat and Canadian bacon. It agreed to take a certain price level. This affected Canada very little as compared to that in Australia. The importation of Canadian lumber in competition with that of Russian and the North Baltic States met with a demand that Great Britain should give a 20% preference to Canada. The Mother Country refused and Canada was obliged to accept its concessions.

No final action as regards the concessions of Canada was taken at the Conference. The preferential tariffs were adopted at the next session and modified according to arrangements met at the Conference. There was no great alteration in the textile industry. Of the 223 items in the tariff altered in a material manner, 125 preferential tariffs were increased by increasing the tariff against foreign countries and 84 received a reduction in duty charged to the British exporter. The Professor's criticism of agreements reached at the Ottawa Conference was that it had not improved world trade but rather increased the tariff barriers. The holding of trade within the Empire was no evidence of any stimulus but merely a change in the channels of trade particularly in wheat. The only probable advantage would be in the stability of market.

Professor McArthur believed that the terms of the Ottawa Conference have impaired Great Britain's power of negotiation of commercial treaties with foreign countries and will create most serious embarrassment in relation to the favored nation clause. The Dominion's right to full membership in the League of Nations would not allow preferential tariffs unless the most-favored nations might benefit by the same negotiations. This is particularly true of Europe and South America. However the arrangements are binding for five years subject to modification by mutual consent. Yet Great Britain is under a most serious position as to the World Conference. He regarded the imposition of quotas as an unfair discrimination against foreign trade.

The speaker also considered that the Ottawa Conference put a severe strain on the stability and integrity of her Imperial ties. There was no bargaining where Australia was concerned since that country was on the verge of bankruptcy but Canada drove a hard bargain. The net results were insignificant. It only shifted the depression burden on foreign countries and represented the worst aspects of economic nationalism. The Canadians have failed to realize their disadvantages because they are not fully internationally minded.

The meeting was then thrown open for discussion. During the business part of the meeting it was decided to hold a banquet at the end of March and that the next meeting would be held jointly with the Debating and Political Union.

Perfume Ingredients Revealed By Professor

If the women only know some of the ingredients that go into the making of the inveigling perfumes they use so generously, they would recoil in nauseation, according to C. G. Schmidt, assistant professor of chemistry. For one of the essentials that go into the make-up of a good perfume is taken from a substance that was refused by a whale. The fixative, a necessary ingredient for perfume, is taken from a refuse which is produced by the indigestion of the giant mammal. When the whale swallows an octopus, he is unable to assimilate part of the creature, and the result is ambergris, from which the fixative is made.

A species of the familiar civet-cat also contributes to the same phase of the process.

"Perfumes change with the fashions," Schmidt said, "just as there was a period in which the women went to the extremes in dress, so there was a period when the demand for perfumes went to the absurd. There are really three distinct types of perfume. The forward, or heady kind, the soft or floral, and the Oriental or mysterious odor. The first named is characteristic of the period immediately preceding August, 1929, when the women thought everything should be more or less striking, and the price of the perfume necessarily high.

"Now, moderation in dress, of which the length of the hair worn is an example, is reflected by an entirely different mode of perfume selection. The soft, or floral type, is now in vogue."

"The oriental, the last mentioned class, is not familiar in this country, but is associated with the East."

All manufactured perfumes are made in three separate processes, the odorous principle, fixation, and the vehicle, according to Schmidt. "Odorous principle refers to the extraction from the plant, which is present in all perfumes which are not entirely synthetic. The fixative is the substance which contains and balances the extract. The vehicle, in which the extract of the plant and the fixative is contained, is grain alcohol.

"The price of perfume varies with the nature of its makeup, but the difference between the cost of producing the article and its selling price, is very large. The profit would seem to be very high, but the risk entailed by the changing whims of the people makes the rate of profit over a long period of time proportionate. Synthetic fixative sells as high as $300 an ounce, and the extract from a certain American rose sells for $60 a pound."

"Where HAVE you been all this time" inquired the Red Queen anxiously. "I've been wondering whether you'd been ill or anything."

"I was," Alice answered eagerly, "with scarlet fever, too. I certainly had quite a time."

"Well, well," the Red Queen remarked sadly, "They do say clothes make the man—and red ones do with a vengeance."

"Whatever are you talking about?" Alice, being an innocent child, looked vaguely puzzled.

"Yes," the Red Queen went on, not noticing the question, "But just wait till you see them in 'civies'. That'll give you a shock. Now when I was your age—."

Here Alice interrupted impatiently. "I do wish you'd explan. You don't seem to realize that I had a very high temperature and had rash for two weeks. They were afraid I mightn't recover, too."

"I don't doubt it in the least," said the Red Queen. "It does take some people that way, but they ALWAYS recover. Now when I was your age I—."

"Will you tell me what you're talking about?" Alice shouted in desperation. "You don't seem to realize that I was at death's door for—."

Here the Red Queen asked with disgust, "Do you mean to tell me you DON'T know what I was talking about? Why, Cadets, of course!"

Alice was taken aback. "No," she cried, "I didn't know that scarlet fever had anything to do with THEM. I really DID have the disease itself."

"It IS a disease with SOME people," the Red Queen drily remarked.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Dear Sir:

Although a good many years have passed since I last saw my Alma Mater, I shall be deeply grateful if you will allow me some of your valuable space. First of all, allow me to congratulate you, Mr. Editor, and your staff, on the excellence of the Journal. It is indeed a fine paper. I was particularly interested in your last editorial, in which you referred to the distribution of printed lecture notes. My own sad case is proof of the advisability of such notes. When at college I was a bright, industrious lad, ambitious to obtain high honours in my academic career. All went well till my final year, when a terrible disaster befell me. While hurrying to my classes I had the misfortune to be run over by a Kingston street car — I suppose many of he young people ar Queen's have never even seen a Kingston street car.—I suffered two broken arms, a broken wrist and four broken fingers, and was for some time unable to take notes. I listened carefully in class, but that was not enough. I failed miserably in my exams and was a disgrace to my parents, my University and my own self-respect. Behold me now, thrust without my degree, upon an unkind world. Had the professors but given us printed lecture notes, I would have obtained my B.A. and would, as a college graduate, hold my rightful position at the head of the bread-line, instead of being as I now am, at the end of it.

Yours truly,

Meds '35-36 To Hold Great Combined Hop

Today will soon be yesterday, one of the days to be remembered with a deep sigh of satisfaction, or just another day. Today's actions will decide tomorrow's reactions. Tomorrow you may be able to swell your chest, delicately compress your brows, and live on your memories: tomorrow your best friend may gaze on you with mingled horror and pity and say "migod Alec, wasn't you there"?

The meds '35-36 dance has not been touted as the great last word on the dance question. It is not to be a dance to end dancing, the function that will throw the Junior Prom into anticlimactic shade, it will be a free-moving year dance, modestly expected by its sponsors to be the best of its kind. Such conservatism is beyond reason, considered in the light of past successes. Those who composed the capacity attendance at the last dance will be with us again looking for more—and in order that they may bring their friends we have engaged a larger hall.

Don't take anybody's word for the success of the party, before or after it ignites. Procure an invitation from a year member and decide for yourself.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Kingston, Ont.,
February 22, 133.

The Editor,
Queen's University Journal,
Queen's University.

Dear Sir,

May I intrude upon your columns to protest against the nature of the Journal's report of the Intercollegiate Assault. Your correspondent admitted that he was exceeding the bounds of propriety in order to have certain conditions such as the "Varsity ride" remedied, but his plea is hardly an excuse for poor sportsmanship when there are other channels through which he might try to secure action.

Despite the fact that your correspondent professed to be quoting from the opinions of eminent sports writers, it would seem impossible for the manager of the Queen's team to give an unbiased account of the Assault, which, after all, is what your readers want. Can the Journal not give us straight-forward accounts of events, informed with that sportsmanship which should come naturally to the properly trained reporter? Even if that should involve cutting off team managers from your list of contributors, the result would be all to the good if decent fairplay to judges and officials of Intercollegiate sport were secured.

Please believe me, Sir, when I say that it is not my purpose to detract a little from the credit our team deserves. The Queen's boys made a gallant stand: I am glad the writer of the story in question could not quote any of our fighters as declaring the decisions putrid or hometowuish.

—J. M. BROWN.

Editor's Note: The writer referred to was not manager of the B.W.F. team. The manager this year was Harold Allan. Also the writer was in no way connected with the Queen's B.W.F. team.

Baths

Baths are complete ablutions of varying degrees of severity, undertaken for social, selfish, or therapeutic reasons. Some people bathe daily, some weekly, and some at longer intervals. Some people on the other hand, do not. Bathing apparatus is of diverse kinds. We have the shower, which is the place of origin of most native Indian dances, and the tub, to which we relegate those we would have stew in their own juices, the Turkish bath, so called because its devotees may dispense with soap and water, and the bird bath for which all light house-keeping apartments are equipped. Tradition has it that empresses in Rome's decadence, and actresses in Hollywood's ascendancy have bathed in milk, but few of us are so gifted by nature or by fortune as to find such quantities of milk easily obtainable.

At present hydrotherapy holds a useful place in the treatment of some diseases, as a method of controlling temperature in cases of hyperpyresia and in the form of continuous baths as a nerve sedative, for instance, but the internal treatment of delirium tremens. Complete immersion in any kind of water for a few minutes renders the immersed one free from all bodily ills, but is likely to project him into a spiritual environment in which he may be subjected to inconveniences unpredictable by science. In any case, such treatment is frowned upon under the present system of government.

History mentions bathing places frequently. Before the masses adopted the custom and so degraded it from a solemn ritual to a casual household activity, utilitarian and unsocial, the great peoples considered the both a noteworthy event in the progress of national affairs. The name of the English city of Bath commemorates the more virile times when Englishmen went there and bathed and drank water. Gout could never have become as aristocratic a disease as it was and is without the stately ritual of the spa treatment, which is frequently effective in this and similar conditions. The substitution of water for less innocuous beverages tends to improve the systemic condition, and stoical endurance of the "strong taste of warm flatirons" must be good for the soul.

Many pleasant associations are connected with baths and bathrooms. The sanctuary of the shower shares with the church the honour of being a place where singers may extend themselves in self expression, no matter what the quality of their vocal efforts. The small room, frequently, with tiled floor and walls, adds a gratifying resonance and power to the reediest of voices, and adverse critics, while they are never wholly silenced, admit the sanction of tradition and modify their protests accordingly. Some day an enterprising novelty manufacturer will make a fortune from soap racks shaped like microphones. Emotional release is always beneficial—to the releaser—but the ties of convention deprive many people of such benefit. To these unfortunates the bathroom broadcast is a life saver, a privilege to be jealously guarded against the attacks of music-loving dissenters and the demands of impatient roommates.

The wise man takes his pleasures singly. There is something disturbingly incongruous about the act of smoking in a bathtub, but nevertheless it is done, probably in most cases by abnormally gregarious people, for whom the awful loneliness of the private bath holds terrors, and to whom nonchalance under terrifying circumstances is impossible without the well-known aid.

Insurance companies and other bodies of statistic fiends assure us that baths cause more accidents than shotguns, but then shotguns are seldom handled by inexperienced amateurs. And there are still those who maintain that bathing is a dangerous and unnatural business for men to engage in, but the cranks we have always with us. Perhaps cranks serve a useful purpose, here as elsewhere, in stimulating people to defiant exercise of the deprecated privilege, who might otherwise be dependent upon self-starting and, in many instances, remain bathless. Bathing may be considered futile in that a permanent effect is never obtained through its performance, but the same may be said of eating. Few of life's futile strivings reward one with as much temporary satisfaction as the complete once over.

Dr. W. T. Brown Refutes S. Leacock's Statements

Toronto, Ont.—Dr. Stephen Leacock's statement, publisheo recently in The Varsity, that university curricula are crowded with compulsory subjects that have no bearing on the course, was declared not to be the case at this University.

"That criticism does not hold here," stated Dr. W. T. Brown, principal of Victoria College. "Rather the reverse is true in the honour courses." He pointed out that honour students spend their entire time on subjects which are all interrelated and they lose touch with the outside world. He mentioned that a criticism that he had of an honour student that was taking an M.A. at another university was that he was biased and could only think along one line. "A man is not a specialist because he is ignorant in all but one field," Dr. Brown requoted. "We have too many of that type of specialist." Dr. Brown would not make any particular subject compulsory but would see that each student spent some time on some widening subject.

"I do not see why anyone should be asked to give a serious statement about such a facetious article," was the comment of Professor W. J. McAndrew, Registrar of U.C., on the humorous article of Steven Leacock's. Considered as a serious question, Mr. McAndrew said that there was no reason for such a criticism as that being made here. He pointed out that a student can select a pass or honour course at his own will. If he enters pass he ought to be able to select five satisfactory subjects out of the wide variety offered.

Mr. A. B. Fennel, Registrar of the University also could see no serious defect in the types of courses offered here. "Some students have not enough to do." Some of the pass students should be in honour courses, he stated. He also took the opportunity to say that exams will soon be here and that the students had better begin thinking about it.

Radio Lost Opportunity Of Scooping Every Paper

Many a reporter, even among the "cubs," would have given his eyeteeth for the opportunity presented upon a platter to a radio announcer in Miami, Florida, a couple of days ago; and we venture the assertion that no reporter would have muffed such an opportunity so completely. The incident may not completely answer the question whether radio will ever take the place of the newspaper as a medium for conveying information to the public, but it does supply the answer that radio, like all else, never will take the place of anything if the man in the key, position falls asleep at the switch.

Radio had the opportunity of "scooping the earth," in newspaper parlance, and of trimming every newspaper in the country. Here was Franklin D. Roosevelt, president-elect of the United States, speaking one moment on a wide hook-up, and the next relinquishing the "mike" to a radio announcer; at the latter moment shots were fired in the midst of a crowd of 10,000 people. Five persons fell wounded.

Quick-eyed, quick-brained reporters at the scene—every one of them—dashed for the nearest telephones to advise their services and newspapers that Roosevelt had been shot at and Cermak hit. But listen to the radio announcer: "There seems to be some confusion here. Photographers shot off some flashlights." And then he went off the air.

In any newspaper office if the opportunity of a lifetime had been missed like that there would have been a vacancy for one reporter.

—Mail and Empire.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Dear Mr. Editor:

I think the idea of distributing printed lecture notes is absolutely brilliant. No matter how carefully one takes down notes, there is always the odd paragraph that seems to contradict the preceding sentences. One intends to ask about it but forgets, only to find a question about it on the paper. In fact, all but the best notes made in class are misspelled, untidy, illegible, irrelevant, incoherent, inconsistent incomplete, and dog-eared at the corners. Of course reading your own handwriting is enough to depress the most ardent soul. If printed notes were given out, the student would not only have a complete record of the lectures but could give his whole mind to the professor's explanations, instead of devoting half his attention to hurriedly scribbling in his book. These sets of coherent and complete notes would also be valuable to keep for reference in future years.

Yours truly,
HOPEFUL.

As probably has been noticed by all who are interested in this organization the annual meeting and election of officers is to be held on Friday, Feb. 24th, in the Theological Hall. Again let us say that none of the executive or members have any interest in the organization as such. The S.C.M. and its executive, are concerned chiefly with making opportunity for the discussion and understanding of religion in its relation to life. There are many ways of accomplishing this in the student world, probably the best ways are still undiscovered. It is reported that a minister preaching in this city last Sunday offered the proposition that disintegration on one level was necessary for re-integration on a higher level. We suspect he referred, among other things, to the social order. If you have any suggestions as to how this organization can be re-integrated on a higher and more useful level, let them come. We are quite prepared to "disintegrate" for the reasonable expectation of doing something more useful. The annual meeting would be a good place to make such suggestions.

The editor of The Gazette will celebrate the arrival of some Lucky Strike and Chesterfield ads by having his wife buy some T-bone steaks for the Sunday dinner. A year ago such an arrival would not have warranted a celebration.—Augusta Gazette.

AT THE CAPITOL

THE SON-DAUGHTER

Helen Hayes, Ramon Novarro, Louise Closser Hale, Lewis Stone, H B. Warner.

Miss Hayes is undoubtedly one of the most brilliant young actresses on the screen. And as such she carries "The Son-Daughter" over most of the difficult hurdles it has set in its own path. But Miss Hayes' ability, Mr. Novarro's operatic tenor, and Director Clarence Brown's keen eye for décor and photographic device cannot wipe out the "ga-ga" that, alas, screams its presence in "The Son-Daughter."

A little ingénue goes a long way, but they keep coaxing it out of Miss Hayes in that first meeting with her lover until you entertain grave fears that she will turn into a feminine counterpart of the Idiot Boy.

This is the story of a girl who renounces a perfectly good love for a very doubtful ideal. A resident of Chinatown, she sells herself to the wealthiest merchant there in order to send the money to China for that faction of the civil war with which she is in sympathy. This act involves the death of her father and her lover, but she escapes with the money for her country. What a grand bit of irony if she, too, had been knifed, and this triple sacrifice had been completely futile. B.

AT THE TIVOLI

THE SPORT PARADE

with

Joel McCrea, Marian March, William Gargan, Skeets Gallagher and others

It must have been a holiday for the Canadian Motion Picture Censors when "Sports Parade" went through. There are at least five good ones.

The usual buddies at Dartmouth starring in all the sports and then quarreling over the golden haired young lady are amusingly portrayed by Joel McCrea and William Gargan, the fair charmer is Marian Marsh. Joel McCrea tries the personal appearance act after his graduation from college, and as per usual, flops. He is rescued by his buddy and buds into a star journalist. In this capacity he meets Marian Marsh and they both succumb to each other's charms. Of course this jealous buddy tries to break it up and then the story goes on in the same old way.

In spite of the over-worked theme one can laugh at "Sports Parade" and pep up the parlor parties with a few new ones.

The shorts are especially good with "Merrie Melodies" and an old Charlie Chaplin release in the silent version. Chaplin's picture brings back the good old days with the bearded villains, long flowing gowns, escolators,—and what have you. If you're looking for a few hours' fun—it's at the Tivoli.—B.

Book Chats

By R.M.

"Brief tales there have been since the world began, since the art of the story-teller was first attempted, since the cavemen filled the long evenings around the smoking fire with narratives of the mysterious deeds of the strange creatures of their own primitive fancy, since the earliest travellers who ventured abroad brought back episodic accounts of one or another of their misadventures, commingled of fact and of fiction—Brander Matthews, The Short Story."

In J. Berg Esenwein's book, "Writing the Short Story", he makes a distinction between the short story and the sketch; the short story and the story which is short (a tale). The former is but a picture without plot and the latter is "a short simple narrative having no plot, and depending for its interest upon incidents."

I may be accused of practising plagiarism under the sanction of quotation marks, but all this is merely evidence to contest the view of an English critic that A. E. Coppard is a great master of the short story art. Nothing is more vicious than trying to make literary forms fit into rigid dogmatic classifications. I should prefer, however, to call Mr. Coppard's charming efforts tales, not short stories proper. And indeed his volume entitled "Nixey's Harlequin" has the sub-title "tales," giving substance to this argument.

There are exceptions to every rule, of course, and "The Green Drake" is the most outstanding in Nixey's Harlequin. There seems to be a kind of logical progression of incident in this leading up to the climax when Jack the Drake's friend Bushy ends their imaginary colloquy by wringing the drake's neck. Infused with quaint humour and picturesque jargon is this tale. Even more fanciful is the tale of The Gollan, a great hulk of a lad who always did whatever anybody told him to do. The Gollan relented of his kindness of heart beseeching a magician to help him in his infirmity, who complied by making him invisible. This led to more predicaments lasting throughout The Gollan's lifetime and when he died this was inscribed on his tomb:

"To choose was my need, but need brooks no choosing."

"The Higgler" by A. E. Coppard, published in Georgian stories (1926) evinces the tendency of post-war English writers to re-discover their own countryside. Frolicsome Rumour, nebulous emanation of mood and tone, pungent satire, these are the qualities that go to make up the extreme charm of Mr. Coppard's stories. "Nixey's Harlequin", after which the collection is called, is an interesting bit of character portrayal, giving expression to the thoughts of a respectable man who was summoned to give evidence in a case involving the death by poisoning of Sally Golightly, woman of the streets.

Mr. Coppard does not let any restriction of length hamper him. Poe's classic rule (capable of being read at one sitting), certainly cannot be stretched to allow seventy-five pages, the length of "Count Stefan", although once a person has started this quixotic tale he is bound to do considerable sitting. José Ratsel typical of the kind of American for whom English people have such a pronounced antipathy is certainly there with the goods. It is doubtful if such a red-hot mamma really exists in Manhattan today. She goes "nuts" near the end of the story to the immense entertainment of the reader. Count Stefan afflicted with a deep conviction of sin growing out of a sojourn with monks while in Finland appears, but is not heard; he refuses to exercise his vocal appendages as a sort of mortification of the flesh.

I am sure you will find these stories eminently readable and exceedingly entertaining.

er paintings (take note botany students) and it is interesting to walk around the room and see how many of them you can identify correctly. Or again the contrast in the paintings themselves may be of interest, some of which are oils and others watercolours.

Particularly outstanding is a painting called "Le Plat de Prunes" by Pierre Renior, the distinguished colourist of the French impressionistic group. The picture full of warm colour harmonies, shows a plate of plums sitting on a white tablecloth and is done by little dabs of oil paint, the broken spaces between the dabs making a pleasing light effect. Such a style of painting is known as impressionistic. Another striking picture is "Flowers" a water-colour by Kohler. It has a very artistic effect due to the broad handling of the medium. A. S. Baylinson, an American artist must be a smoker for his "formes" depicts an ash tray with a box of matches beside it. The picture strives to portray rounded form. "Hyacinths" by Edward Biberman shows the curious onion-like flowers in two red earthen pots the pot at the left side of the picture being in darkness and the one at the right in light with a touch of blue behind. This is probably meant to represent day and night. The style of painting is simple and forceful—it draws the attention. Odilon Redon's "Bouquet de Fleurs dans un vase" is another picture done in the impressionistic manner. It shows tall streaky daffodils in a blue vase. "Still Life-Cat" by Morris Kantor (probably no relation to Eddie) depicts a black cat seated on a table with a bowl of flowers beside it. Mastery of line and form is denoted in this picture. M. Elizabeth Price has a very metallic looking painting termed "Flowers" actual pieces of tin foil being pasted on the picture. Christopher Wood's "Flowers" is a simple composition done in a very light one thus giving a dainty effect. "The Melon" by Max Webber has a low gray-black colour scheme, it shows a melon on a gray cloth with a pewter urn beside it. "Still Life" by Pablo Picasso has a good colour effect in which red predominates. A mandolin, a statue and music are in the composition theme. Louis Lozowick's "Bowl of Fruit" is a fine black and white lithograph even though it is a little off balance. Diego Rivera, a Mexican, has a study called "Still Life with a Coffee Pot."

Modern art is not realistic. It is not meant to be. Nevertheless it is full of vitality and force—it commands your attention either through striking composition or glaring colour effect. It is an art of the present day and as such, students are advised to see it and study it—see what they think about it themselves—whether they like it or not—for it is the young people of today who will form the art tastes of the future. The exhibition will be here a few days more. B. C. R.—

SENIOR CAGERS TO MEET McGILL

Games Will Clarify Basketball Standing

Tomorrow's basketball games in London and Montreal promises to solve a lot of problems, as to who will be crowned champions. Depending upon possible outcomes, Queen's, Varsity and McGill will emerge with a chance at the flag or oblivion.

Should Varsity win in London and Queen's take the champs in Montreal, both teams will still be in the hunt, but if either team loses, their chances will go glimmering. On their performances to date, Western should ease out a slim victory over Varsity, and McGill is favored to win from Queen's.

However, there is plenty of chances of upset in both games and while the game in London means comparatively little to Queen's, their trip to Montreal counts plenty. In short the Tricolor simply have to register a win to stay in the hunt and retain a chance at the title.

It will be a determined lot of stars then that will climb aboard the rattler on Saturday, and regardless of the outcome McGill will realize that they went through a real mill. On their showing so far, Queen's are the only team that has a chance to topple McGill at home for the way they battled the Red team in the game at Kingston revealed their ability. On that occasion Queen's had a distinct edge for the greater part of the game and faded a bit in the last few minutes. Also they were without the services of Donny Bews for the best part of the game, and this player promises to show the McGill fans something tomorrow.

Queen's have improved immensely since that effort and with added experience, and condition they feel good enough to throw enough baskets to down the Reds. The players are making no rash promises for they realize that McGill are worthy foes and doubly dangerous on their own hardwood. They are, however, quietly confident and they will give of their best.

Manager Finley is loath to announce a starting lineup at this date, but it is expected that all will be ready for a full game of fast basketball and whichever combination he decides to toss on the floor, the Red team will be carried along at a dizzy pace.

At McGill University the students are worried about whether a longer kiss is conducive of more bliss than a short one. One boy, in proving that it was, stated that maximum satisfaction was derived when contact lasted 9.27 seconds. Well—as far as a short one and a long one goes, its just a matter of time till the short one-minute wouldn't be enough—so they tell me, so they tell me.—J. J. in Chicago Daily Maroon.

Ottawa Won Return Game On Tuesday

In the return Intercollegiate game played at Ottawa on Tuesday, U. of Ottawa defeated Queen's 4-2. The game was played at the Minto rink giving the Ottawa squad a distinct advantage. The victory practically assured Ottawa of the group championship.

"Mac" Forsythe was again the outstanding player of the Queen's team and repeatedly gained the admiration of the crowd with his brilliant playing.

U. of Ottawa opened the scoring in the first five minutes when Bill Cowley shot from the blue line into the corner of the net. Bill Cowley again combined with Kiefl to make the score 2-0 at

The second period began with the end of the first period. Queen's beginning to show signs of life which was demonstrated when 'Shorty' Morin scored a pretty backhand shot on a pass from Murphy. Devine scored for Ottawa near the close of the period making the score 3-1.

In the third period Queen's outplayed the Ottawa team the entire period but could only get one goal while Ottawa also got one on an individual play by Bill Cowley. Jimmy Arthurs pushed MacDonald's rebound across the line for Queen's second goal.

Bill Carr and Paddy Patterson barely missed scoring in the last period but were outlucked. Bill Cowley, one of the most prominent players in the province was a continual source of worry to the Queen's team and was chiefly responsible for the Ottawa victory.

MOTTO CHANGED

Washington, D.C. — University summer school administrative officers pondered, stroked their chins, thought of the coming vacation session, and decided that the usual summer school slogan, "Summer School Where Summer's Cool", would not do this year.

"It is not of an academic nature," Dean David Thomson, University vice-president, explained last night. "No slogan will be used to characterize this year's summer school."

The noted slogan was created several summers ago by Matt O'Connor, now of the Seattle Chamber of Commerce. The administration has considered dropping it for the last several years, Dean Thomson said.

SPORTS SLANTS

Come on, gang. Let's show these Juniors we appreciate their efforts. They are facing their toughest opposition tonight and every fan helps.

* * * * * *

The Senior Basketball team is also staging a do or die battle tomorrow night in Montreal. The boys are very confident and that helps a lot.

* * * * * *

Newmarket, though ungrouped this season and hampered by lack of ice, possess one of the snappiest Junior teams the province boasts. Many consider they will play off with Stratford for the title.

* * * * * *

Fans, therefore, who pass up this game will have many regrets, as outstanding teams do not often appear in Kingston. This Tricolor gang care nothing for reputations or advance notices. Watch them tear into Newmarket.

* * * * * *

Junior and Intermediate basketball squads dropped games to R.M.C. Cadets on Wednesday. Queen's teams never take the Cadets seriously, until it is too late.

Sports Views

The Senior Basketballers face a difficult task in Montreal tomorrow evening and will prove themselves to be a mighty fine team if they can steal a win. However it is asking plenty for a team to step into the home of the champs and gallop out again with the verdict. They will put up a tough game and McGill will know it.

Regardless of the outcome of the game in Oshawa, Queen's will play either that team or Newmarket in the next round of the Junior O.H.A., the first game being tonight at the Jock Harty Arena.

The student support of hockey this season has been terrible and quite up to Queen's standard. While the Senior B. team has done nothing to get enthused about, no one can cook up a real reason for not supporting the Juniors to the well-known hilt for this team has been consistently good. In the final game with Peterhoro, a goodly turnout of Kingston fans were present, but decidedly few students, and the Limestone natives cheered for Peterboro, or a great many of them did.

Looking around for excuses, I mean real excuses, is a healthy job. The depression or lack of funds is not a decent reason for there are very few students who cannot afford a quarter, and most of them can find two bits easily if a local movie calls.

With Queen's in the fight for junior honours and putting up splendid battle, there is not a reason in the world why the arena should not be packed to the doors tonight. This may be the last opportunity many students will have to see a clever Queen's team in action, and the proper move is obvious. Whether Oshawa or Newmarket come here, the fans are assured of a wonderful exhibition and students owe it to the Juniors to give them the best support possible.

Come on. Get going gang and pack them in and let's drown out the Kingston yells for the opposition.

West Point, U.S.A. Military Academy visit Kingston Saturday night for annual hockey contest with R.M.C.

The Senior "B" hockey team turned in a fair effort at Ottawa but lost to the University of that town and so allowed their last opportunity to finish on top in the Intermediate Intercollegiate race. They have one more game scheduled for March 1st with R. M.C. and will then hang up their togs.

As a result of Wednesday's game in Oshawa which ended in a three all tie, it is now definitely decided that Newmarket will appear here this evening, and Queen's will play the return game in that town on Monday, total goals to count on the round.

R. M. C. Beat Junior Basketballers 15-13

The Junior cagers ran into some hard luck on Wednesday night when they lost a tough battle to R.M.C. on the latter's home floor by a score of 15-13.

The Queen's team fought hard but their shooting was just a bit off. In fact the game was marked by very little scoring punch from either team. There was much rough play and many more fouls might have been called had not the referee been so lenient.

Simmons, McDiarmid and Mateer were the stars of the game. Simmons is showing a good deal of ability and should make good. Stephen and Hemley held down the guard positions nicely and were capably assisted by Crawford, Hunter and Gertsman. Cohen and Ward also played a good game.

Ripley was the outstanding player for R. M. C.

Teams:

Queen's — Simmons, r.f. (4); McDiarmid, l.f. (4); Mateer, c. (2); Stephen, r.g. (3); Henley, l.g.; sp., Ward, Cohen, Hunter, Crawford, Gertsman and Roger.

R.M.C.—Gow, r.f. (4); Wilkins, l.f.; Ripley, c. (6); McLean, r.g.; Winslow, l.g. (3); sp., DeBlois, Jones and Moffat (2).

Prince Of Wales' Visit And Conversats Big Events Of 1901-2 Social Season

There are still a few things left in the Journal for 1901-02 that might bear mentioning. Quite an assortment; be prepared!

Apropos the defunct "Steam Shovel" we found a column headed the BOOK OF THE CHRONICLES OF KING GEORDIE—Chapter LIX. This particular one, dealing with the visit of the Duke and Dutchess of York, (the present King and Queen) bears quoting. We might mention here that the "King Geordie" referred to was the late Principal G. M. Grant. And "Logie MacDonnell's head" was the model used by frantic co-eds who, at the last minute, manufactured countless mortar-boards for the whole college, in order that they might present a properly academic appearance for the great "do".

"Now it came to pass in the year one thousand nine hundred and one that the great Queen was laid to rest and Edward, her son, reigned in her stead. And he ruled over a country vaster than had been, over Great Britain and over dominions beyond the seas. But among those who paid tribute to the great king there were none so crafty and so wise as King Geordie, for he could make two palaces grow where but one grew before. Yea, he could get money out of anything save only the garments of a Frontenac farmer; for these be not so easy as they look." (Apparently a futile attempt was made at passing a by-law in Frontenac County requiring the farmers to shell out in the interests of our think-shop).

"And King Edward called unto him his son and spake unto him, saying, "My son, behold it hath seemed good to me that thou shouldst go unto Australia, unto Africa and unto Canada, where my dominions be, that my people may gaze upon the likeness of a king and do reverence unto him, and that thou may see the land which thou shalt one day govern, unless, peradventure, before thou become a king it may belong to J. Pierpont Morgan. So depart thou from hence, thou and thy wife, and thy valet and thy valet's valet, thy wife's handmaidens and her Saratoga trunks. Take with thee garments of many colors and chests filled with trinkets, C.M.G.'s, photographs and autographs. These my son, are cheap, and thou mayest barter them for writing-desks, furs, jewels, flowers and degrees both high and low, such as thou and thy wife lovest."

"And take with thee a physician—a goodly man and wise—for these countries be overrun with pills—Brown Pills, Green Pills, Liver Pills, Pink Pills, Stomach Pills and Corn Pills. Yea, the only pill they have not is the Umbilical Pill, and it is yet to come."

"So the king's son did as the king had commanded. —— Then came they unto Kingston where King Geordie holds sway.—— Then the king's son and the wife of the king's son did step into their chariots and drove to the palaces of Queen's, surrounded in front and behind by the horsemen of Carr-Harris. And when the charioteer had smitten the flanks of the nearest horses, and when Carr-Harris had hanled on their bridles, then were the horsemen got to move. So that they reached the palaces just one half hour late. And the king's son, looking about him, said, "Who be these men clad in black, whose faces I see not, for they be covered by things with tassels?" And the Chancellor answered and spake unto him saying, "Marvel not, those be the ushers whose caps were made after the model of Logie MacDonnell's head, which is swollen with much learning." And so, far, far into the night.

Here's a bit from the ARTS COURT "CRY": "Divinity students are those who look not upon the wine when it is red, but prefer plain beer."—"As the tail follows the dog, as the string follows the tail, as the tin-can follows the string, as the stone follows the tin-can, and as the small boy follows the stone, so shall justice come to the offender. The sword of justice is mighty, but more terrible in the inch-board from Convocation Hall. There is no escape. Then shall ye howl like a puppy-dog under a wash-tub—all but his tail. Behold the terrors that await the unruly, ye fathead freshmen, and tremble!"

"Conversats" in those days were great events; just listen to this soul-stirring description: "What weather for a conversat! The thermometer away down below zero, everyone hurrying along in muffling furs, while within, in the warm glow of her room, the Queen's girl is draping herself in the ganziest of garments for the occasion.—Hark! There the bell rings, the cab is waiting (any foaming chargers too?) The maid dons her many wraps (woollen spencers, scarves, woollie tights, etc., etc., etc.,—in fact ETC.) steps boldly out into the clear frosty night—What a pleasure to be early and stand back and watch the great muffled figures come bustling (naturally) in. Wait a moment, and lo! from the cocoon has emerged a butterfly. (Of the cabbage variety!) Here they are on all sides, these beautiful butterflies—fluttering about here and there, waiting for the moment when they shall be free to go away upstairs and be admired." (My g—! What's holding 'em).

"The moment comes, and the host of sweet maidens demurely (Elaine the fair, Elaine the lovable, Elaine the—silly ass) follow their chaperons through the long halls and down the winding stairs (yes children, and the old mother bear said—) to where the dear, patient men stand waiting for the maidens to come and amuse them. Little wonder that the butterflies were impatient for this moment to arrive." (Egad, this strain is telling; hold our hand, we can't bear to look.) And then, when they are all tripping the light fantastic and treading measures and each other's toes, "one of the fair damsels unexpectedly dropped her train, and a poor unfortunate man had to make frantic leaps in the air to escape from her toils".

"And then the refreshments—sweets for the butterflies, for, of course the gentlemen had no thought of taking food when these were fluttering about." (How ethereal of them!)

And then in the midst of all this gay whirl, "some unkind individual thought of home; one and all caught up the idea, the maidens scurried to the cloak-rooms, put the poor crushed roses again in their box, donned their wraps and sped away home, dreaming happy dreams, and with songs in their hearts." (All in a twinkling of an eye, my dears!)

Alberta University To Try Holding Debate Over Radio

Something new in Western Canada debating is being attempted by the Debating Directorate in conjunction with the University of Alberta. A debate on a national issue, to be handled by radio, will be held on March 3. Debaters of the University of Alberta will give their speeches over the Edmonton station, in hookup with CFQC. The replies will be made by Saskatchewan debaters over the local station. Rebuttals will be made in the same manner. If arrangements are completed, the debate will also be broadcast over B.C. stations. The debate will undoubtedly prove of much interest to the public.

On Feb. 28, a team from this University will meet a city team in the second event of this series. Never before, we believe, have students taken such an interest in national affairs. In past years there has been a definite attempt on the part of those who chose debating subjects to avoid anything but the most academic of questions. If any timely question was chosen it was always carefully selected from international fields so as not to offend anyone. A perusal of the subjects recently debated in this university reveal that the students of today are certainly interested in social questions and determined to acquaint themselves with affairs.

The debate of Feb. 21 is further evidence of this new spirit.

Medical Stick Wielders Stage Interyear Game

Fifth and sixth year Meds. staged a hickory wielding exhibition of interyear hockey at the arena recently, and Fifth year took the verdict 4 goals to nil.

It was a peppy affair from start to finish and the final year were downed not only by some stellar offensive work on the part of Bob Clark, Johnny Earle, and Galway, but mainly by the remarkable display of net minding by Bernstein, the Cochrane Cuttlefish, for Irish seemed to have a dozen arms and a flock of feet.

Final year tossed over a collection of puck chasers of no mean ability including "Shorty" Moran of the Senior "B" team and an imported goalie who shall henceforth be designated "X". They also supplied the referee in the person of Denny Smith, and then couldn't score. Denny rang the bell a few times, and on one occasion there was a real offside. He also called back one goal that Fifth year scored, but all that was looked for.

Fifth year looked mighty good in spots, and with the knowledge that Bernstein was going to look after his end of the battle, the rest went after the seniors like wildcats. Joe Josephson insisted upon playing, and actually touched the puck once, and the ice thousands of times.

Necessity is the Mother of Invention

Embarrassed over his inability to blow smoke rings, a Northwestern freshman has overcome his social handicap by inventing an automatic smoke ring blower. The apparatus consists of an old cracker box with a hole pierced in one end. The machine is filled with smoke, the tox tapped and beautiful rings issue from the vents.—Syracuse Daily Orange.

YOUR BIG NIGHT THE JUNIOR PROM

The word has gone round the campus that the 1933 Junior Prom is to be the finest for many years. Rumor has it that the Committee now devoting all its time and energy to the organization of this remarkable social event has a number of novel surprises ready to spring upon the guests of the Junior Year next Friday.

Plans for the conversion of the La Salle ballroom into "an elfin palace of delight" are by now well on their way to completion and it was stated today that both decorations and favors will capture the hearts of all those fortunate enough to be present.

It has been decided to have two suppers in order to obviate all risk of crowding; during these intervals an interesting entertainment will be provided, and although no details have been made public it is known that something out of the ordinary in this line is to be expected.

Tickets for the Junior Prom will be on sale tomorrow morning and may be purchased from any member of the Committee, at a nominal charge of $3.00.

The Journal learns that the watchword is: "Watch for the blue poster!"

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Editor,
Queen's Journal,
Kingston.

Dear Sir,—

Permit me space to voice my protest to the report of the Intercollegiate Assault at McGill. Your reporter, incensed at several at least doubtful decisions, wrote up his account in a manner totally unbecomming to a college paper, and to the spirit in which intercollegiate sport should be entered.

The writer had occasion to visit at Varsity shortly after last year's assault. It may be remembered that it was found necessary to reverse a decision at Varsity's expense in the bout in which Bannister participated. The stench which followed on the Blue and White campus had not cleared when the writer arrived; and, grossly ignorant of these things, he attributed the unpleasant aroma to a high degree of unsportsmanship.

During his comparatively short sojourn in these parts, your correspondent has witnessed two bouts—both boxing—in which the consensus of opinion of those present would indicate that visitors had been the victims of partisan decisions.

In view, therefore, of the inevitable fallibility of judges from which our own are not exempt, it might be well to restrain our press from such violent outbursts as disgraced our last edition.

Win, lose, or draw, we are justifiably proud of our B. W. & F. team, which demonstrated a far greater ability to "take it" and grin than did our press representative.

Respectfully,
CHAS C. COCHRANE,
Arts '35.

Arts Society Meeting

The Arts Society Meeting of Tuesday the twenty-first was conspicuous for the lack of important issues and small attendance. It was decided that a joint meeting with Levana should be held; the details being left to the Executive.

A motion was passed that the election of officers of the Arts Concursus should be put off until the fall.

The problem of Arts pins, and where to get them, is still occupying the Society, and the secretary was instructed to gather further information. Arts '36 were kind enough to entertain the Society following the adjournment of the meeting.

Painting As Old As Human Race Says Dr. Brown

Extension Lecturer Traced Art Through The History Of Man

"The desire to record life in the form of painting is as old as the human race," said Dr. Brown of the National Art Gallery, yesterday in Convocation Hall, in the last extension lecture of the term. From such drawings as those found in caves in Spain and France it may be said that art developed before clothes, nationality or even architecture.

"There has never been a great civilization without a great art," went on Dr. Brown, and as an illustration the speaker mentioned the Egyptian epoch.

The Greek period was the greatest of any in the history of art, the Italian Renaissance being a close second. Starting from this second period the speaker outlined the development of art, illustrating his remarks with lantern slides, and holding the close attention of a large audience throughout the lecture.

The various schools of art were treated with and included the Florentine, Venetian, German, Flemish, Dutch, Spanish and English. In relation to the Flemish school, Dr. Brown remarked that Reuhens is one of the greatest of all painters. He was not only a painter, but also a diplomat.

The English collection in the National Gallery is the second largest. There was no indigenous art in England till Hogarth. After his time, however, painting developed greatly. Reynolds represents the summit of English portrait painters. As well as producing excellent work he also was able to produce it quickly. He was able to paint one hundred and twenty portraits a year.

An interesting feature in West's "Death of Wolfe" mentioned by the speaker was the fact that the prominent positions in the picture were sold by the artist.

In closing the speaker pointed out that art is not a static thing nor can it be tied down to any definite method of production.

No Smoking in University Buildings

The following is a communication received by the Journal. Students are urged to comply with the request set forth herein.

"I appeal to all students to obey the rule against smoking in any part of the University buildings, except in rooms set apart for the purpose.

"I deplore the necessity as much as any of you. I like to smoke everywhere. But I obey the rule of the University and I ask you all to do the same, because neglect of the rule involves serious risk of fire.

"Last week the discarded butt of a cigarette started a fire in Fleming Hall which, if it had not been discovered in time, would have put the University out of action through the loss of lighting and heating, and inflicted serious financial loss.

"It is only a few who are too selfish and anti-social to co-operate with the rest for the safety of Queen's. In order to bring these into line, I have asked all members of the Teaching Staff to report the names of any students found smoking or discarding cigarette butts inside any University building except in a recognized smoking-room. Convicted offenders will be fined $5.00 each.

"It is not worth it.

W. H. FYFE."

Women Have Equal Chances With Men In Publicity Work Says Miss M. Williams

Levana Members Hear Successful Publicist And Writer At Second Of Fireside Lectures

Many new and interesting avenues of thought were opened up to members of Levana by the Fireside Talk Thursday evening, when Miss Mabel Williams of Ottawa spoke on publicity work. Miss Williams is a journalist who has specialized in travel publicity, and her address drew an attractive picture of that profession.

"Formerly," said Miss Williams, "publicity was a lady of uncertain reputation. Her voice has been considered too loud, but recently improvements have led to more cultured methods, and the status of the profession has risen."

Miss Williams divided publicity work into four fields: straight advertising, publicity managing, educational and travel. In all these fields women have equal chances with men, and college graduates have special advantage, in that they possess, as a rule, greater intelligence. Personality publicity is being used more and more nowadays, and women's personality is especially useful in such advertising as that of Eaton's, Vogue, Punch, etc. The radio field also has many opportunities for this type of publicity.

The fascinating field of travel work is the most familiar to Miss Williams, and she devoted the greater part of her talk to it. Miss Williams first entered publicity as an administrator of national parks, and the aim was to educate public sentiment in regard to the parks of Canada, and thus encourage tourist travel. Most travel work is carried on by the railway and steamship lines. In travel publicity posterwork is a field in itself, and is becoming more artistic in quality.

Interesting Details Of Publicity Writers' Work Revealed By Miss Mabel B. Williams

Miss Mabel Williams of Ottawa, who was the guest speaker at the second Fireside Talk held recently, in an interview with the Journal, gave some interesting details of the work of a publicity writer. Miss Williams spoke of her work as a writer of travel publicity and of the variety of tasks which face a person engaged in this profession. When asked to compare the positions of advertising copyist, such as large stores employ, and publicity writer employed by travel agencies, or hotels, Miss Williams said that although the salaries in the advertising position were often large, and the position itself an enviable one, the publicity writer had the fascination of travel and the possibilities for wider experiences, but that the two positions could not be compared satisfactorily.

The salary range for this type of work was relatively high, Miss Williams said, and often ran as high as $15,000 a year, with some exceptionally well-paid members of the profession receiving a much larger sum.

"The opportunities for publicity work are better now," Miss Williams said, "especially as the competition between firms has made the necessity of greater advertising evident. This field is opening to women with more responsible positions.

Dr. J. Hawley Spoke To Miller Club Men

Speaker Took Rainy River As Type Region

In an instructive lecture Dr. J. E. Hawley explained problems connected with the Couchiching sedimentary series to a meeting of the Miller Club held in Miller Hall. Dr. Hawley who is head of the Mineralogy Department took as his type district the Rainy River Region in which there is a large development of Couchiching rocks especially near Steeprock Lake and Rainy Lake. He told that the Couchiching is correlated largely by lithology and similarity to other schistose rocks of the district. Work in the Region has indicated the existence of a major fault along the contact between the Couchiching and the granite. The lecture was well illustrated by diagrams and several large geologic maps of the Regions concerned.

Tricolor Co-Eds Lose To McGill Squad In Finals

Team Entered Finals Carrying 15-12 Win Over Western Cagers

By Helen Kennedy

Montreal, Feb. 25—Carrying a 15-12 victory over the University of Western Ontario team, into the finals of the Women's Intercollegiate Basketball Meet, the Queen's team lost a closely contested game to the McGill six by the score of 21-20. With both teams playing heads-up basketball, the title and the coveted "Bronze Baby" at stake, Queen's, led by their high-scoring captain, Doreen Kenny, gave the new champions a hard run for the title. With the score being tied constantly by both teams, it was only in the last few minutes of play that McGill, on penalty shots, ran up a lead which Queen's were unable to overcome.

Throughout the game which was exceptionally fast, Queen's defensive system kept the score down by shutting the McGill forwards out of the scoring area. Kay Wayling at centre got the tip-off many times from Babs Goulding, star McGill defence, and paved the way for scores by Doreen Kenny and Ruth Fishleigh. The defensive work of Kay Wayling, Dorothy Napthali and Jo Tett also kept the McGill forward line from scoring more heavily. The efficiency of the referees accounts for the numerous technical penalty shots.

Although in the first few minutes of play, the McGill forwards gained a 4 point lead, Bud Yuill and Doreen Kenny, by a series of field goals and penalty shots started Queen's scoring. Nice field goals and penalty shots by both teams kept the score tied until Ruth Fishleigh gave Queen's a 7-6 lead. Cynthia Bazin eluded her guard to score for McGill and a few seconds later made a penalty shot. Ruth Fishleigh scored twice in succession to bring the score to 11-9. Queen's defensive system weakened and allowed McGill a clear shot which with a following free shot gave them a 1 point lead. A penalty shot by Bud Yuill gave Queen's the necessary point to tie the score

Hatless Freshman Can Bail Out Stolen Lids

The appearance of a number of bareheaded freshmen around the campus prompted a Journal reporter to make enquiries. He found that the explanation of the hatless vogue lay in the depredations of the officers of the Arts Concursus, who some time ago confiscated hats worn by Frosh in defiance of the tam regulation.

Sheriff O'Neill now announces that the owners may redeem their hats on payment of a fine to him at 321 University Ave., telephone 149-M.

Medicos Held High Revels In City Hall

Combined Year Dance Was Colourful Affair

The gallery of Kingston's former mayors in oils looked down benignly last Friday night upon a scene of high spirited if rather decorous festivity in Ontario Hall.. The committee in charge of the Meds '35 and '36 combined year dance, chosen as men old and wise in the business of conducting dances, lived up to the reputation thus thrust upon them. Ingenuity and enterprise were plainly written over the decorative appliances which transformed staid old hall. Soft lighting over a well-filled floor. Bob Warmington's music at its very adequate best, and the high good spirts of the crowd formed a combination which precluded the possibility of a moments dulness.

The original programs, in the form of music albums, were a record of the tunes you remember best, those which have survived the critical test of a few year's popularity and the best of the late hits.

In the unavoidable absence of Dr. and Mrs. Glenn Burton, Dr. and Mrs. Clarence Lewis were the patron and patroness.

'Will Shakespeare' By Clemence Dane Was Given Second Place

With Eugene O'Neill's "Ile", the Ottawa Drama League became the winning group in the recent Regional Drama Festival held in Convocation Hall. Although not announcing the standing of any other of the plays Sterndale Bennett, the adjudicator, said that he would recommend the Ottawa Drama League's production of Clemence Dane's "Will Shakespeare" as second choice.

"Ile" was the last presentation on Friday evening, while "Will Shakespeare" was one of the plays presented on Saturday evening. Lawrence Mason, dramatic critic of the Toronto Globe, was present on Saturday evening, and spoke briefly. Dr. W. H. Fyfe moved a vote of thanks to Sterndale Bennett for his excellent work as adjudicator.

Speaking of "Will Shakespeare" on Saturday night, Mr. Bennett said: "The costumes were magnificent and more elahorate, I think, than any others seen in this festival." The adjudicator went on to speak about the other two plays presented. "The Locked Chest" by Masefield, was presented by the Kingston Art and Music Club, and J. M. Barrie's, "Half an Hour" presented by the Ottawa group.

Saturday afternoon the inclement weather reduced the size of the audience. Three plays were produced by "C" and "D" groups of the Ottawa Drama League, and The Young Thespians of Belleville.

The adjudicator, in his remarks concerning the different plays, advised the actors to get right down and study the characterization of the play. In reference to "The Monkey's Paw" by W. W. Jacobs, and presented by the Young Thespians, Belleville, Mr. Bennett said that the play was very difficult for amateurs and that the better it is played the more difficult it becomes. The adjudicator also declared that the actors did not reach the depth of the play at any time, although they formed a likeable group.

In speaking of the "Merchant of Students Advised To Put Dimes Back Into Circulation By Buying Copies Of The Jag

"The students will get their first "Monthly Jag," next Saturday morning", declared the Editor of the new magazine when interviewed by a Journal reporter at 10.30 P.M. this morning. "Yes, you can tell your great reading public that the Jag will be on sale on Saturday unless some unforeseen accident such as a couple of fires or an earthquake crops up."

The Editor of the Jag sat on the edge of a cracker box and watched the staff press his trousers on their big Hopkins printing press while answering the multitudinous questions asked by the enquiring reporter.

"The Jag will sell for ten cents and will be the cheapest Jag on record. But when I say cheap I refer to its monetary value only, not to the Jag itself. It will consist of sixteen pages crammed with humorous stories, jokes, cartoons and ads. The Jag Saw puzzle contest will give hard-up students a chance to try to win the five dollar prize for the first complete solution to the puzzle," continued the Editor waving his fountain pen in the air. "When the Jag comes out on the campus it will cause a commotion, I assure you. I may leave for China on Friday afternoon but I am willing

The Extension Lectures

With yesterday's lecture by Dr. Eric Browne, Keeper of the National Gallery, the series of extension lectures arranged and presented by the Queen's Lecture Committee comes to a close. While this yearly program of talks has always been of outstanding merit we feel sure that the many who followed them on the successive Monday afternoons during their scheduled course are of the opinion that this program was the best offered in many years.

Through the efforts of the Lecture Committee Kingstonians and students were given the opportunity of hearing such eminent men and interesting speakers as Dr. Carleton Stanley, President of Dalhousie University, Mr. H. Spencer Clark from The Guild of All Arts, the Hon. Vincent Massey, Sir Robert Falconer, President emeritus of the University of Toronto, Dr. R. G. Trotter, Associate Professor of History at Queen's, the Hon. Martin Burrell, Parliamentary Librarian, Dr. F. E. Lloyd, Professor of Botany at McGill, and Dr. Eric Browne, Keeper of the National Gallery, who brought the series to a close yesterday.

This is surely a capable group of men and judging by the capacity audiences which greeted every one of these speakers their efforts found favour with the local public. By arranging such an attractive series of lectures and offering it to everyone without admission charge the University thereby renders an invaluable service both to students and Kingstonians. The privilege of hearing such qualified authorities is not indeed an every day occurrence and we feel certain that the general public appreciates this service, and is anxious to have these lectures programs continued in the future.

A special word of congratulations should also be addressed to the University officials for broadcasting these lectures and thus making them available to an incalculably larger public.

Back To Spiritual Values

The past half century can indeed be characterized as an age of marvels. But how surprising it is that we have become so quickly used to the wonders of the wireless, to the magic of talking pictures, to heavier than air flying machines, and to stock automobiles that travel at speeds of almost a hundred miles per hour. We soon accept such wondrous performances as inevitable, but there is one thing which, however often repeated, remains as an ever recurring source of awe and wonder. This is the unfolding of a simple little flower. We contemplate on the mystery of its birth. Immediately there arises in our minds such questions as: "Is this all Chance? There must be something behind all this."

Such thoughts we believe have a comforting effect, and offer an irrefutable answer to the challenge of materialists who regard science as the All-Mighty Power. Their theories have made an inroad into the beliefs of the fickle populace, but now as ever, the way out of the rut of depression lies in a return to spiritual values.

In an address delivered some time ago Alfred Noyes, the British poet, echoed this belief in a return to spiritual values, as the emphasis placed in scientific research tended to retard spiritual vision and progress.

Mr. Noyes said in part: "We have followed the road of inductive reasoning rightly enough for certain temporal purposes, and devoted ourselves to analytical methods, forgetting that the intellect and spirit of man have other faculties, nobler and more profound, more essential to a full life than anything that inductive reasoning can give us, faculties that are concerned not with the temporal but with the eternal. The analytical specialist, in every department of thought, has been leading the world along a diminishing road, which eventually runs out into nothingness. Science has accomplished marvels for the material comfort of mankind, but it has been divorced from philosophy and it has misled the world by suggesting in direct defiance of its own maxims that the greater values can be produced by the less."

Addresses like this one by Mr. Noyes help to emphasize the almost forgotten value of a spiritual standard. An infallible way out of our present economic disorder lies in the abandoning of the materialistic standard in favor of the spiritual.

Superstitions

It is really amazing when we consider what a large part superstition plays in this modern and so-called civilized world of ours. One would think that with our superior knowledge and intelligence such a survival of the past would not exist. Yet millions of moderns turn from electricity to seek enlightenment out of the distant Dark Ages. Superstition, although it may not rule the world as it did then, nevertheless continues to exercise a decided influence over its decisions.

Logic professors would rather go an extra block than walk under a ladder; innumerable intelligent people refuse to start a journey or undertake a contract on Friday; black cats still strike terror into the hearts of many; average humanity, still insists that dreams are premonitions although they are actually caused by fatigue and indigestion; many of us haven't lost the habit of knocking wood; and the number thirteen still remains an implacable hoodoo to the world at large. Finally the majority of us have a "lucky piece" either on our person or lying in our bureau drawer.

These are just a few of many superstitions that people have. The extent to which they follow superstitions may also be ascertained when we learn that faith healers, charm-hawkers, crystal-gazers, voodoo doctors and spirit mediums pick the national pocket to the tune of millions annually, despite police intervention. This shows how gullible many of us are, to be beguiled by downright fraud. Numerologists, phrenologists, and their many confreres also seem to be making a good living in these hard times.

Civilization at its best is nothing more than veneered savagery. Man despite his outward progress has always been a creature of primitive passion and impulse, and in this respect differs in no way from his prehistoric ancestor, who likewise worshipped his fetishes, although he was forced at the same time to wade through the ooze of primaeval forests and engage in relentless battles with dinosaurs and pterodacyls. Ancestral taboos and ancient instincts still cling to Man's blood stream and form an integral part of him. That is why he still is a slave to superstitions, although probably not to the same extent as his ancestors.

Common sense should show us that all these hoodoos, jinxes and the like are nothing more than a lot of piffle and that our future is not determined in any way by a lot of rabbits' feet or other lucky pieces. It is bad luck to break a mirror, but only so because it costs us money to replace it.

Corsages or No?

Panhellenic dance officials deemed it advisable to forbid the wearing of corsages by girls last week. The local organization of florists threatened to bring suit against them on the basis that it was "in restraint of trade." Representatives of the allied florists, when interviewed, stated that no action would be taken unless "a ban against corsages was decreed by Junior Prom heads."

The Junior Prom committee found it advisable and in the interests of University of Denver students to place that ban against corsages. What consequences may follow are yet to be seen. The fact remains, however, that University of Denver students will not be intimidated by any organization that is, in the estimation of student officials, working against the best interests of the group.

There is no escaping the fact that the "keeping up with the Joneses" psychology functions on this campus. Every student wants his girl to have the adornment that is worn by the next student's girl. The fact applies to corsages. Corsages cost money, and the one way to eliminate the financial stress that falls upon many male students who feel it necessary to buy corsages, as well as the embarrassment that may come to those persons who would like to buy them, but who absolutely can not, is to forbid the wearing of them at a student dance by every one!

That is only fair and just. Prom heads are to be commended for their firm stand. And, we might add, there are "Fighting Pioneers" in every phase of campus life—athletic, academic, and social — who feel that in their hands, and not in the hands of outsiders, rests the governing of their own lawful actions.

—Denver Clarion.

Ultra Modern or Ultra Foolish?

If a visitor were to be suddenly transported from Mars and set down on an American campus, one of his first impressions would be the dominion of profanity in the college vocabulary, nearly to the exclusion of more cultured language.

So common has this habit of emphasizing and making vivid the speech by these swear words become that college students are not even conscious of what they are saying. The words just come rolling out without any effort or thought.

This trait is acquired by the freshman student to give him "college polish." By practice and repetition it increases to such an extent that he is graduated uttering a word of profanity in every ten.

Yet they are ashamed of this uncouth language when they are among cultured people. Slips that they make embarrass them and they vow to discard this rubbish from their speech. They mean well, but they haven't the stamina to stand by their decisions.—Daily Kansan.

Scholarship Meat Plan

A new type of scholarship is being offered at the University of Kansas. "Scholarship Meal Plan" is the name that has been applied to it. This plan has been adopted for all students who for financial reasons have found it impossible to continue their work in the University during the rest of the year. Through this plan these students, who would otherwise have to leave school, may obtain meals at an average cost of 10 cents each.

Through the co-operation of the Memorial Union operating committee at the University of Kansas and the director of the University cafeteria, three meals a day are to be served six days a week in a room on the top floor of the Union building. These meals will be served at definite hours of the day and only for those students who gain permission to eat at this special table. To gain permission, the student must go before a committee and this committee considers his source of income and his scholastic record. The latter must show that the student is earnestly working toward his education.

The scholarship meal plan was made possible through a fund provided by faculty members and citizens of Lawrence, Kan. The plan is a worthy one and will be watched closely by other colleges throughout the nation. The committee in charge of granting the students the right to eat at this remarkably low rate will have to watch closely the applicants, as there will be a number of students who could afford to eat at regular boarding places and by taking advantage of this scholarship meal plan will deplete the fund set up for the plan and deprive deserving students of their only means of attending school.—Daily Texan.

RULE OF SWAP

Convinced that deflation and inflation and reflation are impractical, sponsors of the Common Peepul's ball February 10, today will confer with Carroll Geddes, student financial adviser, regarding the adoption of barter for tickets for their annual party in the Minnesota Union.

"We are not in sympathy with any of the panaceas offered at present such as script or wooden money," John Glas, ball chairman, said yesterday.

Some doubt arose over the carrying out of the proposal, however, inasmuch as barter will require considerable time at the ticket office on the night of the dance. Confusion is certain to result over the relative bartering values of the various cast-off pins, hats, books and pencils that may be brought to the Union.

Symphony Orchestra Gave Fine Program

The Kingston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Oscar Telgmann gave a very finished performance in Grant Hall on Sunday evening.

The programme opened with an overture "The Calif of Bagdad" by Boieldieu. This selection began with the violins furnishing a rather slow melody with the clarinets softly piercing through. The pace gradualy quickened bringing in the flutes and wind instruments. The brass instruments were then included forming a firm background to a graceful swinging melody by the rest of the orchestra. The tempo gradually increased with the tympanies rolling out a thundering appeal which ended the selection.

The second number was a descriptive selection "Babillage" by Gillet. This selection featured the muted instruments. It was very beautiful and soft with the flutes and clarinets coming in like a gentle breeze. It quickened momentarily then died out in a whisper.

"In the Mill" another descriptive selection by Gillet was next offered. It was characteristic of a water-mill. Throughout this number could be heard the tongue of water hitting the blades of the propeller. This gradualy increased representing the further opening of the flumes to allow more water to pour over the blades. The hum of the saws cutting through the logs could then be imagined as the piece finaly ended.

The orchestra then gave way to Mrs. J. Crawford who sang two delightful hymns, one of them being "O Lord, Correct me," by Handel. It was evident by the applause received that more songs by Mrs. Crawford would have been appreciated.

The orchestra next played Mozart's symphony "Jupiter". The symphony consisted of three movements, Allegro, Menuetto and Finale. The allegro was a gay movement in a brisk time. It started rather heavy, then slowed considerably to allow the introduction of a beautiful melody. This was carried by the first violins with frequent obligato parts by the second violins and the other sections of the orchestra. It finished in the same brisk movement that it was started.

The Menuetto was a slower movement with the clarinet and piano heard a little more frequently.

The finale seemed to combine the other two movements. It began with a steady powerful rythm. It slowed and then increased to the original tempo. It slowed once more as if gathering its breath for the final crescendo which was climaxed by the blair of the brass and the deep-throated roll of the tympanies.

The last group consisted of "Pizzicato" by Bonstet and the "Polish Dance" by Scharwenka. The first, as the name suggests, was characterized by the plucking of the violin strings. It created a very novel and pleasing effect supported as it was by the clarinet and flute.

The "Polish Dance" with the gay swing was a fitting piece to close the programme with. It is a well-known air, and was so well executed that the audience were hard strained to keep their feet on the floor.

Little is known of this gallant group of musicians who have been organized for twenty-two seasons. They carry on year after year, giving their time and their money without comment or appeal. We would like to hear such concerts, more often. A little better advertising would help and they are well worth a good admission price.

Dr. Kent Describes Mission At Trinidad

Far to the south of Halifax, on the island of Triuidad, is a small mission which, although almost forgotten is, never-the-less, an outstanding success resulting from the work of the church, declared Dr. H. A. Kent in an address delivered before the Queen's Theological Society.

Setting out from Halifax, Dr. Kent explained, one passes the beautiful Bermuda Islands, and comes to the island of St. Lucia. Here small dark boys delight the visitors by diving into the water for coins. At Barbadoes is noted the dense population of negroes who are noted for their distinctive accent—even as a Scotsman is noted for his "lock" and "brae". Martinique is famous for its volcano that threw stones, the size of one's fist, a distance of two hundred miles during an eruption.

Finally, Trinidad is reached; in spite of its varied history it still shows signs of Spanish influence. The abolition of slavery created a serious labour problem in sugar manufacturing which was settled by the importation of indentured servants from India. After their term, many of them purchased land in Trinidad and achieved a physical state of well-being.

Dr. John Morton, while visiting the island was shocked to find that no provision for the spiritual welfare of the Indians had been made; in the fall of 1867 he went to Trinidad as a missionary and was later joined by Dr. Grant. Then he undertook to educate the sixty thousand labourers, and soon the government became interested, finally taking complete charge of educatiou. The lasting results in preventing Trinidad from becoming largely pagan constitute one of the most sucessful pieces of mission work.

Students Experience Hectic Adventures

This is the story of the misadventures of five men in a car—or at least in a model T Ford—over the week-end.

About 12.30 p.m. on Saturday last, Max Rapoport, Paul Young, Bob Echlin, Hubert Morris, and An Other (Other being the driver) set bravely forth from "this delightful city on the shores of beautiful Lake Ontario" (see remarks of recent speaker) enronte for Perth, esconced in an old Ford, the back windows stuffed with cardboard and the door plugged with an old quilt.

And then the chequered history began.

First they had to stop because the coils ceased to function in protest against being stuffed full of suow; and then Max decided that he was nearly frozen, and another stop had to be made to let him unfreeze. Eventually, despite all the rigours of the blizzard, Smith's Falls was reached after four hours on the road, and finally Perth itself hove in sight.

But of trouble there is no end. The Driver having deposited his carload of shivering humanity, carried on to Carleton Place, ran into a telegraph pole and wrecked the car.

Our heroes were now caught with their nether garments unhitched but being resourceful Queen's men they decided to put not their faith in Henry Ford but to take the train back to Kingston. Max, as a postgrad, felt that dignity demanded an afternoon train; the others decided to leave by the 1.30 a.m. loco, in order to be at the University bright and early on Monday morning for a modicum of intellectual stimulus.

Alas for the ways of mice and men! Instead of changing as required at Sharbot Lake our young friends remained on the train for another eight miles before they found out their mistake. And now, having had the train stop and deposit them on the track at 3 o'clock in the morning they set out to make their way back to the last stop, ploughing along the line through snow standing waist high.

They got there in the end, after a weary tramp; but not before Morris discovered that a bottle of pickles—yes pickles—which he had bought in Perth had not merely split on him but was actually leaking down his leg. Action was taken.

Finally after a wait of an hour and a half at Sharbot Lake the Wanderers climbed aboard a train, and arrived back in Kingston a few minutes after eight. A great week-end!

600 Students Get Warnings After St. Valentine's Day

As an unpleasant aftermath of Valentine's Day, some 600 students will find out within the next day or so just how many of their courses they are funking or about to flunk. Midquarter warning slips are being sent out now to those who are doing unsatisfactory work.

More than one warning notice will be sent to some students, bringing the total estimated number of slips sent out to about 700, according to E. B. Stevens, registrar.

Ocean Practice

The sea exerts a compelling influence upon the human mind, drawing back the man who once has sailed with a power nearly irresistible, and apparently purposeless. For having drawn the man the sea seldom offers satisfaction but rather augmentation of a restless desire. Those who have sailed for a lifetime are usually left with a vague sense of frustration, feeling that they have no more than scratched the surface of earth's deepest subject.

A sea-going ship is an isolated community and as such must be provided with a medical attendant and facilities for the execution of his duties. A fortunate man, this doctor, frequently an object of envy to his landbound colleagues. From the standpoint of medical experience the life yields little and those who resign themselves to nothing else tend to drift away from the interest in things professional. But taken as an interlude in one's regular occupation, every trip provides something of interest in the field of medicine. Nowadays, when steam brings a ship within a few days distance of any port, major emergencies seldom need to be dealt with at sea. Our grandfathers, however, were truly the standard-bearers of life and death, in that the management of their cases rested entirely upon themselves, sailing vessels often being weeks or months from outside medical assistance.

Every British ship carrying a surgeon is equipped with a dispensary and a sickbay. The former is stocked with an array of drugs selected with an eye to economy of cost and efficiency of action rather than for their nostrum value. There are no frills, no taste disguises, no syrups. The sick bay is provided with a few bunks, a table, a very complete set of instruments and tins of sterile drapes. In short, the materials are crude but efficient. The duties of the ship's surgeon vary with the type of ship he is on, be it liner, emigrant ship, express boat or freighter. He is in a vague way responsible for general sanitation and refuse disposal, but these matters are well cared for by the chief doctor—the first mate. He allocates a definite period each day for care of the crew, usually one hour morning and afternoon, while he is on call at all hours for ministration to the ills of the passengers and emergencies arising among the crew. The rest of the time he is free.

His powers are wide and even exemplary. He can refuse to allow case of suspected contagion to board the ship and if he wishes he may quarantine the whole vessel. He may order the captain to reduce speed in order to have less pitching for the performance of an operation, and he may even advise that the ship be diverted from its course in order to land a patient dangerously ill.

The surgeon, aside from the captain, is the only member of the crew who has the entire freedom of the ship. He is free to mingle with the passengers in all the public rooms, spend a rainy morning yarning with the watch in the engine room, poke into the focsle, loll around the wireless cabin or prowl into the depths of the hold. No door is closed to him. When he wishes privacy he has only to retire to his own well-appointed stateroom and inform his servant that he wants no visitors. If he is so fortunate as to pal up with the navigating officers, he may spend many a silhouetted hour "on the bridge at midnight" when all others have retired, in company with the few mortals who guide the ship through the solitude and majesty of the ocean night. At such times it behooves the novice to listen well, and he may be rewarded with tales at which even Ulysses would have marvelled.

Catering to the ills of passengers is quite like hard work, for aside from sea-sicknesses and acute alcoholism they are seldom really ill; Mal-de-mer is in most instances well taken care of by the stewards, but occasionally an obstinate case will demand attention. It provides an interesting study for two reasons. Firstly, there is always a differential diagnosis, and cases of food poisoning, pernicious vomitting, and intestinal obstruction may occur at sea as well as ashore. Secondly, there is glaucoma Atropine is one of the drugs most commonly employed in the rather fruitless effort to combat sea-sickness. Elderly ladies seem to have an especial dread of an ocean voyage and on the advice of well-meaning friends, they frequently overdose themselves with whoosis sea pills. Result — an acute glaucoma.

If one had to deal with such cases on land, it would be regarded as hard work. But at sea, with purple skies and purple water, amid an atmosphere of adventure, the daily grind becomes transformed into a passing kaleidoscope of wondrous incidents, and when the ship enters her home port on the return voyage the doctor who is leaving the service experiences a saddening reluctance at having to sow his gear and cross the gangplank back to the land of ordinary things once more.—(C. E. Corrigan in the Manitoba Medical Bulletin).

Eddie Cantor Really Believes Jim Wallington Great Man

Rochester, N.Y. — Eddie Cantor honestly believes that Jimmy Wallington, a former student of the University, at whom he casts so many nasty aspersions on Sunday nights, is a great man.

Thus Cantor makes public for the first time through The Campus a fact which could never be suspected from the vituperation that passes between him and the handsome, mustached young announcer. The famous "Jimmy" was a member of the class of '28. He was assistant manager of the Glee Club, class treasurer, associate editor of The Campus, Delta Rho prize contest winner, and editor of the 1928 Interpres. He transferred to Union College at the close of his junior year.

"If your University can turn out more men like James Wallington," Eddie told this reporter, "it deserves to be called the finest institution in this country."

Cash For His Kidding

He wasn't kidding either, for Cantor never kids without an air-tight contract. He practically told us as much when, in the course of a backstage interview during his recent one-night stand in Rochester, we suggested that his answers to our queries need not be particularly serious. "Oh no," refused the popeyed little funnyman. "If I think up any flip answers to your questions, I'll tell them Sunday night and get U.S. currency for them."

We had to fight our way through a thick mass of autograph hunters with fire in their respective eyes before we could get to the stage door. Once in, we noticed a short dark man with large eyes and with grease paint and a worried expression on his face, as he paced a backstage corridor. It was Eddie waiting for his cue to go on. Maybe he was worrying about the government deficit. We didn't ask him.

He explained that he could spare but a few moments, for immediately after the show his radio program for the following week had to be rehearsed.

Eddie Speaks

Eddie Cantor thinks that in many ways higher education is a noble thing, for he intends to put all his five daughters through college. His oldest is already attending the University of Southern California, and the second enters that institution this month.

"However, education should not be allowed to interfere with the really worthwhile things in college life," Mr. Cantor states. "I hear that the University of Rochester recently received a bequest of $19,000,000. This sum should not be wasted on things that haven't much to do with football. As Uncle Sam's Advisor, I suggest that $17,000,000 be set aside as a fund to buy liniment for the players."

An expression of pensive sadness dimmed for a moment Mr. Cantor's big black eyes.

Tobacco War Benefits Many American Cigaret Smokers

New York—War between the four big tobacco empires of America spread to a new front today and cigaret smokers benefited by the lower retail prices since "sweet caps" were a nickle a pack 30 years ago. The war entered the financial phase when the American tobacco announced a new wholesale price reduction for $5.50 a thousand Lucky Strikes, less the usual trade discount.

Other companies followed suit. As a result cigaret buyers at the nation's leading chain stores were able to buy a package, a carton, or a dozen cartons at the rate of 10 cents for a packet of 20.

Reporter Found Hearst Using Canadian Paper

A reporter for the University of Chicago Daily Maroon, undergraduate newspaper, was the first to discover that the Hearst newspapers, founders of "Buy American", were buying much of their paper from Canadian mills. The Daily Maroon representative found at the plant of the Chicago Herald and Examiner, that the Hearst interests were trying to conceal this fact by painting a black smear over the shipping company's name wherever it appeared. The enterprising reporter tore off several of these smudges and took them home with him. Scraping off the paint he learned the identity of the Canadian paper plant and the Canadian sales agent.

The Maroon does not condemn Hearst for buying Canadian paper. It congratulates him for having sense enough to know that his "Buy American" campaign is folly when put to practical purposes.

Succession Of Individuals Constitutes Life Says Prof

New Haven, Conn.—In a lecture at Yale University, Dr. Herbert S. Jennings, professor of zoology and genetics at Johns Hopkins University, denied that a doctrine of life after death finds any support in biological science.

"Individuals," he said, "who die exist no more than they did before they began life; no more than they did before the species to which they belong had been produced in evolution . . . Life consists not of indefinitely continuing individuals but of successive ones."

"Modesty forbids me to say any more," concluded the Editor, "but you can take it from me that this Jag will not soon be forgotten around Queen's. S. C. M. Shrapnel

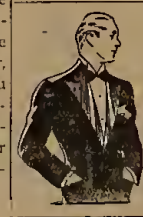
To the smug complacency of a small University the knowledge of National or world conditions comes, too often, as a rumour from a distance. Some of us even imagine that we feel the depression. But the following bit of realism may shock our secluded contentment. It is an excerpt from a letter by a Saskatchewan woman, who is a Canadian and an anglo-Saxon. Previous to the "hard times" she was an interested participant in community life, and is neither shiftless nor unintelligent.

"We can hardly explain to you in words, Mr. ——, our condition at present. Mr. B—— did only a few days threshing last fall, and for that he did not receive any cash. . . . . We have not received any help of any kind and we are all practically bare of clothing. The children have not been outside all winter having neither boots nor stockings and only scanty clothing . . . .

As regards G—— and myself there is neither of us that has got a coat. Between us we have to wear Harry's, which is too small for him. We have one pair of stockings, one pair of shoes which are practically worn out, no overshoes, or rubbers. Our dresses are very poor. We have no underclothes at all. We have to wear them between us. I myself have not been outside all winter as I have to give way for G—— to wear them when she goes out.

Now I will try to explain Mr. B——'s condition which is easily done, as all he has to wear is a pair of old overalls and old rubbers. No other clothing whatever, neither shirts, socks, mitts, underclothing, nor sweater. He has to saw the wood up in the house as he can't go outside."



A postcript adds: "We were glad you put the stamp in your letter to post this as we have not had the price of a stamp since last Fall."

That reminds us of a remark of G. B. Shaw's, "Poverty is not a thing to be sorry for, but to be angry with."

CYNARA

With Ronald Colman, Kay Francis, and others

Cynara falls just a little beneath one's anticipation. It is natural to expect much from Ronald Colman and Kay Francis when they are carrying a workable and smooth play. The problem in Cynara, if not new to the stage, does not develop according to customary film arrangements. It is the story of two people who "love each other very much" and have been long enough married to exchange complete trust. The wife goes away for some weeks, and her husband becomes involved in a liaison, retaining at the same time all his devotion to his wife. The other woman puts a sordid cachet on to the affair, conducted heretofore with circumspection, by taking poison. Perhaps we saw the alternative happy ending sent to small towns, but such an ending is consistent with the character of the wife as revealed by Kay Francis. She is too sensitive and tolerant not to go back to her husband, however dashed her confidence and pride.

Perhaps the flaw in Cynara is an inadequate presentation of the conflict. It is not always sharply defined, and the result is a certain vagueness, a glossing over of the issue. B+.

AT THE TIVOLI

MY WIFE'S FAMILY

with

Gene Gerrard, Muriel Angelus, Amy Veness, Charles Patton, Dedo Watts, Tom Helmore

Gene Gerrard as Jack Gay, and Muriel Angelus as his wife Peggy, are happy newly-weds living at "Peacehaven" until a telegram arrives announcing the arrival of Gay's mother-in-law, Arabello Nagg. She is going to stay a few short months with her husband and daughter. Her son secretly married to the maid Sally is also a visitor. Their baby must be kept at a friend's house.

Jack now goes into the garden to reflect on the arrival of so many in-laws all at once. Dr. Knott, as a salesman of all things, dressed like the mayor, arrives in a one horse cart to make a sale. He offers to tune the piano for a meal, but they have no piano. The father-in-law obligingly sends a telegram, giving away his piano, which arrives and is placed in the summer house. At this time the visitors arrive. Of course there was no one to meet them.

Jack's sister-in-law comes with them. She has stage ambitions and buys a book from Dr. Knott "How to Become an Actress in Three Parts." She becomes a pupil of the Doctor's old friend, Miss White, an electionist. She duly arrives and mistakes Jack for her friend. He believes she is insane, and she believes he is insane. He rushes out, meeting the Doc. and orders him to remove the lunatic in the house. The Doctor rushes in with a shot gun, but meets instead the mother-in-law whom he drives not out, but into hysterics. Miss White appears again, which gives Jack an uncomfortable feeling when he realizes the mother-in-law has been insulted.

At this time Sally and Willie bring the baby to the house. They decide to hide it in the summer house with the piano. A complicated situation occurs when the ownership of the piano is referred to, for unknown to Jack and the Doctor, the baby is also there. It has been discovered by the mother-in-law and Jack's wife who do not know the piano is there. Everything turns out peacefully and Jack is exhonorated. The picture is worth seeing. B+.

Harvard Lampoon Banned

Minneapolis — Because "Tutors, Just Tutors," latest issue of the Harvard Lampoon, resembled the general appearance of "Babies, Just Babies," a children's magazine, too closely, it has been banned from the mails, a press dispatch stated yesterday.

Citizens of Cambridge had protested in such numbers that the entire issue of 3,000 copies was held up until an opinion could be obtained from authorities.

Let Loevinger, editor of Minnesota's Ski-U-Mah, derided the action. "The policy of censorship, long known to be a futile one, reaches such proportions as this only at Harvard and Minnesota," he said.

Co-eds at Stanford University must pass physical examinations and be excellent in their studies before they are allowed to stay out until 12 o'clock on week nights, and 1.30 Saturday nights.

By R.M.

Mr. Masefield, in his recent interview with the Journal, is reported as saying, "I think that the radio offers a great opportunity to poets who wish to increase the popularity of poetry." Such a proposal, coming at a time when the policy of Canada's national broadcasting service is being developed, is very timely. Nothing, in the opinion of this writer, would have a greater effect in restoring poetry to the former popularity than the broadcasting of programs of readings in English verse.

In late years poetry has undoubtedly fallen off greatly in popular interest. Many people of considerable literary enthusiasm and musical appreciation are surprisingly indifferent to its appeal. This indifference is largely due to the fact that poetry is not read aloud as commonly as it used to be. As a result, many people of genuine aesthetic sensibility do not love it, for the simple reason that they have never heard it read, and are entirely ignorant of one-half of its charm. The writer was very much impressed by the sympathetic response made to Mr. Masefield's readings, by people in the audience to whom written poetry had been entirely unattractive. If such people could be given an idea of the real music which lies in all good verse, there is no doubt that poetry would increase astonishingly in popular estimation.

The broadcasting of readings in poetry would undoubtedly contribute to such an effect. These broadcasts would have to be arranged with as much care as is now used in the transmission of a symphony concert. The reader would have to be selected with the utmost care, for on him would depend the success of the venture. He is, if you will, a symphony orchestra in himself, and the board of selection would be well advised to adopt Hamlet's speech to the players as their guiding principle.

In regard to the poetry to be read, the writer is inclined to disagree with Mr. Masefield. The masterpieces of poetry have sufficient popular appeal, when suitably presented to make experimenting in "popular verse" entirely unnecessary. Such experimenting, if it were made in an honest effort at self-expression, would be entirely permissable. It is very apt, however, to degenerate into a catering to popular whim. In the hands of artists who lacked the inspiration of genius, it might easily be made the excuse for an attempt to attract by strange and outlandish forms, rather than by the expression of a sincere and deep emotion.

Nothing could be more fatal to such a programme than an excess of local pride. Most of us will endure a certain amount of discomfort for our country, but nobody is going to listen to the inane drivellings of some sentimental ass, merely because he is Canadian. Much as he loves birds, for example, the writer would hate to be treated to a succession of bird calls in a programme of poetry readings.

An increased interest in poetry would give an impetus to the movement, rapidly gaining ground, to clear the stage of this elaborate scenery which has so cluttered it up lately. An audience who really appreciated Shakespeare's poetry would not need a whole battlefield to see a battle, or anything but the simplest arrangements to see Romeo and Juliet. The real thing in the Balcony scene is not the ivy-covered wall, nor the handsome Romeo, nor the beautiful Juliet. It is the lyrical ecstasy of love in which every line of the dialogue is so rich, and which elaborate scenery only obscures. —H. W. T.

Women Have Same Chances As Men In Publicity Work

There is plenty of opportunity for the talented in cut-out silhouette work also.

"A study of the field is essential in publicity," stated Miss Williams. "The slogan, 'shoot straight and don't waste your powder" is as important in publicity as in the army. Advertising books are designed to appeal to certain classes, and planned to create on dominant impression, similar to a short story, and equal in intelligence and craft. Travel organizations analyze the populace and know who are most susceptible to clever advertisement. Curiously enough, college graduates fall into this category.

"The first essential qualification to become a good travel writer is the capacity for having experiences," continued Miss Williams. "This does not mean having an eventful life, as much as having the capacity for feeling experiences in everyday life."

Miss Williams quoted Edith Wharton's description of this trait: "The way to have a personal view is to look at a thing so long that you make it your own." The best plan is to carry a notebook in which to make "on the spot" sketches. These inimitable impressions should be re-written after a period of reflection in order to give them their full value. The second necessary qualification is the ability to write vivid English. In writing, one should avoid what Miss Williams termed the "woolly" style. This is found generally in the work of young authors, and is characterized by a profusion of impressive and abstract terms. The artificial "fizzy" style is likewise taboo.

"It pays to be sincere, even in publicity," continued Miss Williams "Nothing is as impressive as sincerity. As a certain writer has said, "Travel writing is the conveyance of gusto." Enjoy the experience yourself first of all, and fuse the facts in your imagination so that information be given as lightly as possible. The mystery of the subconscious is very potent in writing, but drudgery must precede elucidation."

Many travel writers use no advertising: for example, Katherine Hale's "Legends of the St. Lawrence", and Esther Brown's "Quebec Sketches." These books are written and designed artistically, and appeal to the refined taste more than straight advertising.

There are interesting openings for talent in studying the background of Canada. "The European usually complains that Canada has no background, and that the landscape prophesies rather than commemorates," said Miss Williams. "We know that this is not so, for Canada has had several centuries of romantic history, and we should point out her historic value to the tourist and to ourselves. Don't follow the obvious course, but observe local surroundings, and try to feel the intangible 'spirit of place'. We must gather the mist and give it back as rain. In cultivating this attitude, it would be well to remember Flaubert's advice to de Maupassant: "Talent is long patience; look at a thing until it assumes a quality different from any other."

Miss Williams advised young writers to keep two notebooks, one in which to record attractive words, the other for experiments in description. Technique, which is usually neglected, is the true foundation of effective writing.

In conclusion, Miss Williams summed up the most important requirements for publicity work: first, inventive, as opposed to artistically creative imagination; secondly, the ability to write lucidly and with distinction; and lastly, the ever-necessary capacity for hard work.

At the close of her address, Miss Laird and Helen Kennedy offered Miss Williams a hearty vote of thanks.

MUSIC

An unusually satisfying program was offered to the Musis Club last Thursday. The Trio, consisting of Mary Baker, Jack Baker and Paul Miranti, played as their first number the sonorous Bach-Gounod Meditation, and continued with the lovely Ballet Music from Rosamunde (Schubert) and Coleridge-Taylor's energetic waltz, "Three-Fours". Then the Trio rested, while a selection from Wagner's "Ring" was played, after a short introduction by Jack Baker, who related the circumstances under which the four operas, known collectively as "The Ring" were composed. They deal ostensibly with the downfall of the old gods, but Wagner has injected much of his own philosophy into them. A few of the leit-motive were indicated by the Secretary, who pointed out how the themes which at the beginning set forth the glory of Valhalla, were transmuted in the closing scene to depict its utter ruin.

The Trio played three more pieces: the soft Berceuse (Ilyinsky), the lilting Chaminade Serenade, and finally the brilliant Polish Dance (Scharwenka), in all of which they showed the mastery which comes with long practice. This was followed by what was new to many of the members, a program transcription of Beethoven's Fifth—it was quite novel to be able to listen to forty-five minutes of music, only interrupted once to change the record; and so the evening drew to a close.

JUNIOR TEAM CHAMPIONSHIP HOPES FADE

Juniors Outplayed By Newmarket Team

Newmarket Red Jackets lived up to advance notices when they outskated and outscored Queen's Juniors 5 goals to nil in the opening game of their playdown fixture. The visitors presented a well drilled team whose speed and snappy forward-passing attack seemed to baffle the students who were, however, far from disgraced, and battled the starry invaders every inch of the way.

The Red Shirts took a commanding lead in the first period when they ran in three goals. Queen's showed to best advantage in the second period which was scoreless. In the last frame Newmarket notched two more counters and several times brilliant saves by James held the Redmen at bay.

It would be difficult to select a star on the Newmarket team as every member showed to advantage. Possibly "Red" McArthur earned brackets in the matter of effectiveness as he was responsible for 3 tallies. Mann at centre proved to be a great playmaker and repeatedly gave his wings good openings. Of the defencemen Vail was outstanding, his great speed carrying him dangerously near Queen's goal. The other members of the squad were all prominent at one or another stage of the game.

For Queen's James in goal played brilliantly and time and again robbed the visitors when they were right through. "Johnny" Wing turned in a great game and only the hardest kind of luck prevented him from scoring. Lewis and Bryden contributed many fine plays and together with Wing and James shared the honors, though the whole team gave everything it had and forced the flashy Tanners to show their best wares.

1st Period

The Tricolor got away to a poor start when in attempting to clear the puck one of the local forwards lodged it in his own net. This happening early in the game was enough to dishearten any team, bnt the locals stuck to their guns. Newmarket stepped on the gas and Mann tallied after a nice passing play. Shortly later the Redmen were through again and though James saved several shots in a row the puck finally slipped into the cage. The visitors looked mighty good around centre ice but did not show the greatest of finish around the net.

2nd Period

The second canto was scoreless and though the students tried desperately they could not score. They did hold Newmarket goalless though and had almost as much of the play as did the visitors.

3rd Period

In the final spasm the winners counted two goals both by McArthur who tallied the first on Doran's pass and the second on a snappy play with Mann. Again in this period Don James gave a great exhibition of net tending and repeatedly turned the visitors back.

Line-up:

Queen's		Newmarket
James	Goal	Farder
Smith	Defence	Vail
Gibson		Doran
Wing	Center	Mann
Lewis	Wings	McArthur

Mustangs Basketeers Down Varsity Cagers In London

Whatever hopes Varsity may have had towards tying up the Intercollegiate Basketball race, were rudely shattered at London on Saturday when the purple clad Mustangs snared out a 27 to 26 victory.

It was a tough blow to Varsity for they led at half time by a 15 to 12 score and looked to have a safe margin on the play. However, Western came with a rush that meant points and by some sensational playing on the part of Hogan. With a couple of minutes left to play the score was tied 25 all, and the Western crowd groaned as a foul shot was awarded to Varsity and they netted what appeared to be the winning point. Hogan made the issue certain for Western when he looped in a pretty basket with seconds to go.

INTERYEAR BASKETBALL

On Saturday afternoon from two till three in the New Gym Arts '34 and '36 met in the final game of Interyear basketball.

Arts '36 played a fast, clean game with only four personal fouls during the game. Lilley was the star for '36 with eight points to his credit. The scorers for '34 were Vanstone, Marks and Hall.

The Freshmen were a faster team and quite ontdistanced the juniors throughont the game finishing with a score of 31-12 for '36.

The teams were as follows:

Arts '34 — Vanstone, Marks, Cohen, Hall, Heath, Orr, Courtise, Kornbluth, Gherman.

Arts '36 — Stephen, Ward, Bews, Lilley, Henley, Rodgers, Corlett, Salter, Gertzman.

Sports Views

McGill grabbed off still another title on Saturday at home when they nosed out a strong Varsity Swimming team by two points , the final standing of the meet being 35 for McGill and 33 for Varsity.

This victory together with the winning of the senior basketball game with Queen's as opponents, and the winning of the Girls' basketball battle also from Queen's gave the Red colors of old McGill three Intercollegiate titles. Not a bad day's work for any university.

Queen's Senior Basketeers faded from the Intercollegiate race as did the other three teams when they lost their final game of the season to McGill at Montreal 47 to 25. It was hardly expected that Queen's could take the champions on their own floor, but the local fans figured that the score would be a lot closer than it was. McGill are worthy champs and should go far in the Dominion playdowns.

The Juniors realized that they would run into tough opposition before they had progressed very far along the play off trail, and they figured correctly. Newmarket, although not as polished in their work around the nets as they might be, proved to be all the advance notices claimed.

The Juniors put up as courageous a battle as any Queen's team has ever waged, but they could not match the blinding speed of the visitors. It was apparent early in the game that if the invaders did not wilt from the fast pace they set, they would emerge victors by a comfortable margin. Off to a miserable start when the first goal counted against them gave Newmarket an unexpected counter, they fought against superior foemen to the last second and made the opposition battle for every goal.

James and Wing appeared the equal of any Newmarket players, and their sterling work did much to keep down the score. James batted pucks out with every portion of his anatomy, and will fit in wonderfully next year. The brunt of the attacking fell on Johnny Wing and he skated himself into exhaustion trying to stem the tide. Every other member of the Tricolor worked very well, and they have no excuses to offer.

The crowd while not large was the peppiest of the year and the Tricolor got a few well earned yells during the evening. About the only thing we could cheer about was a husky-bodycheck applied to a Newmarket sweater, and Queen's caring nothing for size or reputation, spilled many.

The Senior "B" team sees action for the last time tomorrow evening when they take on the Cadets in the last scheduled game of the Intermediate Intercollegiate series. Queen's can redeem themselves for a lot of indifferent efforts by downing the Cadets by a decisive score. They have the ability and with a little determination they can do it.

McGill clinched the Intercollegiate Basketball title again this year when her warriors defeated a desperate Tricolor team in Montreal, while Varsity were losing a game to the Mustangs in London.

This was McGill's third basketball championship in three years, and they also possess the additional honour of not losing a game in that time in intercollegiate clashes. They can now enter the Dominion playdowns if they wish.

Queen's girls lost the Bronze Baby by a veritable eyelash on Saturday in Montreal, but they achieved plenty of honour in so doing. They put up a tidy battle quite in keeping with Queen's traditions and lost out in the last minute or so. Many thought McGill would have a cinch defeating Queen's after the Red team's easy win over Varsity, but Queen's co-eds showed all kinds of fight and ability to almost walk away with the verdict.

Tricolor Co-eds Defeated By McGill In Basketball Finals

and but for an unsuccessful second shot they would have had a 1 point lead at half-time. Score 12-12.

The second period started with a rush by Queen's. Do Kenny scored a field goal and followed it with a penalty shot a few minutes later. Successive goals by both teams after fast passing, tied the score at 18-18. Kenny scored the last Queen's goal to take a 20-18 lead. With 4 minutes to go, McGill scored 3 points on technical overguarding by Queen's, and scored the deciding point. Full-time score 21-20.

Doreen Kenny was the high scorer of the game with 12 points, and her spectacular playing was a feature of the Meet. The McGill forward line was well checked by Queen's, but Winnie Chisholm scored 8 of their points.

Line-up:

McGill—Forwards, B. Bazin, M. Lynch (Capt.); Defence, B. Goulding, S. Hay, M. Davison, T. Gobson, T. Clouston, W. Chisholm.

Queen's: Forwards, D. Kenny (Capt.), R. Fishleigh, B. Yuill, E. Rickard, N. McGinnis; Defence, K. Wayling, J. Tett, D. Napthali, I. Galbraith.

Referees—Miss Harvey, Miss Bain.

Varsity—E. Wallace, M. Atkin, D. Dempster, A. Butler, M. Clintock, B. Longley, P. Palmer, S. Logan.

Western—M. Wong, G. Patterson, G. Rath, Gargon, L. Gidley, Miller, Dampier, Tompany, Meagle.

In their first game of the Meet Queen's defeated Western by the score of 15-12. The game was a splendid exhibition of team play. Queen's played a steady passing game and concentrated on a defensive system. The feature of the game was the splendid defence work of Kay Wayling, who kept Mary Wong, star Western forward under guard and prevented her from running up the usual high score. Ruth Fishleigh was high scorer for Queen's with 7 points and it was the Do Kenny-Ruth Fishleigh combination that scored 12 of the 15 points.

McGill won their first game of the Meet from Varsity 39-27, gaining the right to enter the finals. Winnie Chisholm was McGill's high scorer with 22 points. Varsity's play was ragged and they missed many clear shots.

Western and Varsity played in the consolation game, with Varsity leading 22-16. Varsity's game had improved since their defeat by McGill and their team play looked like former Varsity champions. Western's star forward, Mary Wong, gave her team a substantial lead.

SPORTS SLANTS

Montreal proved to be Jonah for visiting teams in quest of Intercollegiate titles on Saturday. The men's Senior team took one on the chin, the girl's lost a very close game and Varsity lost a swimming title, and all three to McGill.

Almost every sport has just about reached the end of its tether, and unfortunately there is little to show for any of them in the way of honors this year at Queen's.

With other titles in the air, namely degrees, Queen's students can now tear into their books and notes with the same determination that they showed on various fields of sport.

French Songs Sung At Sunday Musicale

The music lovers who were at last Sunday night's musicale had some delightful and original fare in the form of a "Soirée de Musique de France et de Canada". In plain English this means that the French-Canadian choir of eight singers again rendered the program which had such a success a few weeks ago in Convocation Hall. The only criticism of these folksongs is that they are too short, and that they were sung with such briskness and spirit that the audience was left breathless, wishing vainly for more verses of each "chanson Petit Rocher" and "Voici l'hiver arrivé" were especially tantalizing in their brevity, and encores of these songs would have been very welcome.

The program was varied by two double-piano Concertos played by Miss Black and Mr. Packer, and Miss Appleby and Mr. Packer respectively. The first of these concertos, C minor, gave the audience Beethoven at his most graceful, while the second (Schumann in A minor) made a contrast with its powerful force and dignity.

The evening was rounded out by two violin solos from Jack Barber. The "Mazurka de Concert" (Musset) was a tour-de-force, and though played with skill it did not appeal to the audience as did the plaintive "Indian Lament" (Dvorak-Kreisler) with which the Musicale was brought to an end.

Intercollegiate Basketball Title Again Won By McGill

Montreal, Feb. 26 — The third Intercollegiate men's basketball championship in three years was in possession of McGill University to-night following a sparkling 47 to 25 victory over Queen's University here Saturday. The Red team has not been defeated in any Intercollegiate match for three years.

McGill is now eligible for the Dominion playdowns, but it is not likely the Collegians will continue in the hunt, the travelling schedule being difficult and coming right before examinations.

Queen's showed their best form in the second half, having been down 21 to 8 at half-time. Newman led their scorers with 10 points, while McLaughlin and Bews teamed excellently on the defence. Don Smaill was a standout for McGill with 17 points.

The teams:

McGill—Rice, g. (6); Calhoun, g. (9); Young, c. (8); Lewin, f. (1); Smaill (17); Hammond, f. (2); Ross, g. (4); Lee, g. (10).

Queen's — McMahon, f. (1); Brown, f. (0); Newman, f. (10); Rooke, f. (0); Hallett, g. (2); McLaughlan, g. (2); Carter, c. (4); Bews, g. (6).

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Kingston, Ont.

Editor of the Journal.

Dear Sir:

Never before has our student undergraduate sheet passed criticism of any kind on the members of the University Staff, and I see no reason why this should be allowed to begin now. The remarks by "Outis" in the last issue of the Journal were in both exceedingly poor taste and poor English.

Until this column was introduced we were free from the objectionable type of comment and personal remarks which characterize papers such as "Hush." These never help the publication as one of our sister universities has discovered.

In the last issue we read "Who is Mr. Robb?" We would say, "Who is Outis, but the writer of an anonymous and undesirable column?"

I would suggest, Mr. Editor, that is this column is to be continued, it be done under the writer's name.

Levana '33.

Dear Mr. Editor.

I should like to express my agreement with your editorial entitled "Learning at First Sight."

Surely it is evident to even the most conservative minded of students and professors that printed lecture notes would allow students far greater opportunity to understand and to discuss the points which the lecturer is trying to make. A great many students of Politics, History and English—to take but three examples, would be able to derive more benefit from their courses if they knew what the general outline of each day's lecture was going to be. And lecturers, too, would find it easier, or at least far more satisfactory, to lecture to classes who were able to take an intelligent interest in the day's work, and who were not merely to be converted for the time being into a collection of frequently inaccurate dictaphones.

The University authorities would, in my opinion, be well advised to give serious consideration to the suggestion made by the Journal.

Yours, etc.,
HONOUR STUDENT.

Biocracy As Substitute For Technocracy Is Proposed

Boston, Mass.—Alumni of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology last week were introduced by Dr. Walter B. Cannon, professor of physiology at Harvard University, to his new plan, "Biocracy," as a substitute for Technocracy in curing the ills of the world.

"Biocracy," he said, "would apply to body politic the simple biological laws of the human body."

"Civilization is in a mess," he said. "Nothing could be more cruelly stupid than the existing situation with grain elevators bulging while thousands of hungry are in bread lines; with growers of cotton and wool unable to dispose of their stocks while children are suffering from nakedness; with factories idle while men willing to work in them are shut from their doors."

The professor then drew an analogy of the human body and the body politic, and suggested the biological basis for a solution of financial, economic, industrial and governmental problems.

Difference To Be Keynote Of Prom

Different! That is the keynote of the arrangements that have been made for the Junior Prom. You will like the Prom because it will have much more to offer than the ordinary dance. It will be fascinating, memorable, intimately appealing; and, in a word, it will be different.

Those chairs and tables in the La Salle Ballroom will be banished and arrangements have been made for lounges, chesterfields and what nots to be placed at advantageous places under the spell of soft lights, and within easy reach of a not-too-crowded dancing floor.

The decorations engineered by the Science men are cleverly done and will give everyone that "under the stars" feeling. Bob Warmington's vastly improved orchestra will render the season's popular hits and will continue playing throughout the two supper numbers. During supper, Master of Ceremonies "Ace" Stewart will introduce entertainment extraordinary, which everyone is bound to enjoy. The favors have aroused considerable curiosity but are still a deep dark secret.

The new Queen's song introduced by George Ketiladze will introduce every dance and will add particular spirit to the occasion.

Date Problems Met By "Dance Rackets"

Hamilton, Ont. — While McMaster has been striving to solve women's date problems by the formation of a Fifty-fifty Club, other universities have been working toward the same goal by the establishment of "gigolo clubs" and "dance rackets".

According to the Hamilton Spectator a newly organized club at Tulane University, New Orleans, will provide "attractive, well-dressed dates for all occasions for small remuneration."

"The club, it was explained, has been formed to solve the date problem for women attending Newcomb College.

"No names of 'clients' will be made public, the club promises, and all engagements will be held strictly confidential. An escort to a formal party requiring a dinner jacket will collect a fee of $2 while 'informal' dates will charge $1.

"Any expenses, including taxis, shows, flowers, night club cheques and similar items naturally will be paid by the young woman, a campus poster declared."

From Toronto comes the rumor of a dance racket at Varsity where gay young blades are said to sell their best girls at four for a dollar. Investigation showed little foundation for the rumor however.

One of the professors, on hearing the story, remarked that "It was cheap at the price."

"Prices must have come down," he said. "Especially if you consider it from the girl's point of view. How do you know she wasn't in cahoots with the boyfriend? Perhaps they went fifty-fifty on the proceeds. I think twelve and a half cents is little enough to get for dancing with some of those fellows."

PHOTOMANIA?

Students in Contemporary Thought at Northwestern must hand in their photographs with their notebooks hereafter. The reason given by the instructor is: "I have so many students I can't remember who they are from who's who when I grade the notebooks."

The dean of the College of Social Science at the University of Oregon received a letter from the Atkins corporation, Business Brokers of America, of Los Angeles, offering to buy the entire university outright for cash.

"Ile", Produced By Ottawa Dramatists, Winning Play

Venice" scene presented by Group "D" of the Ottawa League, Mr. Bennett pointed out that in a Shakespearean play, as long as the voices were pleasant and musical it didn't matter where the actors came from or where they were educated.

In speaking of the winning play on Friday evening, Mr. Bennett made particular mention of the acting of Art Pettapiece, a former Queen's student, who took a very active part in the Dramatic Guild at Queen's last year. Mr. Pettapiece played the part of the steward in "Ile".

In his remarks on "The Locked Chest" by the Drama Group of the Kingston Art and Music Club, Mr. Bennett said:

"The scenery and properties were good and Thord's make-up was good. This is my main criticism of the play; it lacked variation throughout. This cast kept giving us what we wanted and then losing it again. The play travelled very heavily and I think this was due to lack of assurance induced by dropped lines.

In concluding the Adjudicator stressed characterization as the most important single feature in acting. He also reminded the actors and audience that while there had been a spirit of competition throughout the festival, it had primarily been a festival of drama.

The entire festival went very smoothly and much of the credit is due Prof. J. A. Roy, general chairman, and the members of all the committees.

Mrs. Reed Directing G. B. Shaw Comedy

Mrs. G. B. Reed has taken Androcles and the Lion in hand pointing out several things noticed in the Dramatic Festival plays. Under her supervision it is assured that the pith of Shaw's satire will be got at, making for realistic performances, on Friday and Saturday evenings, March 10th and 11th.

Headliners in the cast include such performers as Hazel O'Kilman (Megaera); Leho Ware (Lacinia); Arthur Sutherland (the Captain), and Scarth Macdonnell (Androcles). Lebo is doing fine work and Art Sutherland's experience is bearing fruit in better dramatic sense and voice quality. Scarth and Hazel are bound to get the most out of their comedy scenes.

Among the less-known, but promising actors, Cromien as Spintho is convincing; Shannon makes a really terrifying lion; Todd certainly looks the part of Ferrovious and rehearsals have shown that he can work up to a towering passion of righteous indignation when the spirit moves him.

Erskine Morden of Gammer Gurton fame will play the Editor. Others include Dave Malen, Lentulus; Joe Malen, Gladiator; J. E. Germain, Metellus; George Ault, Keeper; R. U. Mahaffy as Centurion. In addition to these, a horde of slaves, soldiers, Christian men and women will be required.

As was mentioned in a previous issue this is an uproarious comedy showing Shaw's vitriolic talent (tongue whetted to razor keeness) at its best. The rapier-like thrusts at conventionalized christians in this play have given offence to many short-sighted individuals who fail to realize the truth of Shaw's contention that institutionalism has often obscured the original ideals of Christianity. The situations throughout are ludicrous, yet convincing building to a strong climax.

This evening the Dramatic Guild journeys into the fastnesses of the hinterland to stage a group of plays at Sunbury, a surprisingly enterprising little town in drama. The plays include: The prologue of Androcles and the Lion, The Fatal Rubber; So This is Paris Green and The Valiant.

Success In Business Hinges Upon Three Points Says J. S. McLean At Banquet

"Success in business hinges on three points," said Mr. J. S. McLean in the course of his speech at the Annual Dinner of the Commerce Club. The first of these Mr. McLean continued, is the attitude which the beginner takes towards his routine duties. Mr. McLean referred to this as the

J. S. McLEAN

'accountant's spirit' and it consists of taking pride in one's work and doing it well regardless of the time it takes. Second, the essence of progress in business as in civilization is competition. The man in business who renders service more efficiently than his competitor will get all the business. Here may it be noted that the superiority need not be great but its very existence will swing all the business his way. The young man takes on a job at the stage of efficiency at which his predecessor left off. If, after mastering the tricks of the trade and arriving at that stage he can add some improvement to his performance no matter how slight, he has succeeded in his job and promotion is assured. It is in this last phase of the competitive system that a university training gives a man a great advantage. His outlook is broader and he has acquired and cultivated a taste for abstract ideas; moreover, his capacity for absorbing them is greatly enlarged. He is able to make his business a hobby, applying to it the principles he has learned, the theories he has formed, and making them the major interest of his life.

At the end of his address Mr. McLean received a great ovation and was thanked by Doug Muir, President of the Comerce Club.

The main toasts of the evening were: The King, proposed by Doug Muir; and the University and the studies in Commerce, by Stan Stanyar, to which Dr. Mackintosh replied. A welcome to guests was extended by Dan Wade.

THEY KNOW WHAT THEY WANT

Smoking is one of the qualifications specified for the coed to be queen of the Engineers' Ball at the University of Colorado. The "Secret Six," a group of engineering students delegated to select the queen, announced the requirements: she must smoke mild, inexpensive cigarettes; she must detest strong cigars and pipes; she must abhor alcoholic beverages; she must be susceptible to the attentions of men.

A NOBLE EXPERIMENT

A scientifically minded Winnipeg student, while attending a lecture, was desirous of noting the effect of fire upon brilliantine and promptly applied a lighted match to his neighbor's hair with a flaming result. In an interview the victim of the experiment remarked in crisp tones, "Vell, I should worry. I saved two bits, the price of a singe." The miscreant announced ardently, "It was in the interests of science. I would do it again if I had to."

Raeburn To Be Subject Of Address By Dr. Gibson

The famous Scottish artist, Raeburn, will be the subject of an address by Dr. Thomas Gibson in the Douglas Library, Room 111, to-day at five o'clock. Dr. Gibson, who is intimately acquainted with the environment in which Raeburn worked as well as with the artist's career, will illustrate his lecture profusely by reproductions of the artist's works, some of which are in the form of slides loaned for the occasion by the Art Gallery of Toronto and the National Gallery. This is the sixth lecture in the series arranged this winter for members of the association. Membership is still open, and the dues are only fifty cents.

Science '33 Petition For Abolition Of Final Year Attendance Ruling

To Present Petition Explaining Reasons For Abolition, To-day

The following is a petition drawn up by Science '33, and which, the Journal learns, will be presented before the proper authorities today.

To the Principal, the Dean and the Faculty of Applied Science.

Dear Sirs,—

We, the undersigned, being members of the final year in Science, would like to suggest that the present rule for attendance of final year students at classes be abolished.

Our reasons for making this suggestion, found from our experience, are as follows,—

(a) A student on reaching his final year realizes the value of work and, if allowed, can cover the necessary amount of work without being forced to do so.

(b) The present system tends to give the student the opportunity to pass his courses, covering as little work as possible in the set hours.

(c) The necessity for "calling" of classes en masse will be removed if the attendance rule is abolished.

(d) If through sickness, sport, or any other cause a student gets behind in his work he will be able to make up the work in his own time—which he is usually well able to do. This applies particularly to labs. It can also be applied to lectures. Many lectures may well be made up by outside reading. Those that cannot be easily be made up will not be unavoidably missed.

(e) The faster working student can spend more time on general reading instead of being forced to attend labs. where he has little or no work to do.

(f) If he can be relied upon to do work that should be done without compulsion the graduating student will he more independent and reliable.

(g) Professors will be regarded as advisors and instructors instead of slightly superior school teachers.

(h) Closer co-operation between students and the faculty will result.

We suggest the following changes to the present system,—

Witty Shavian Comedy Makes Good Progress

The Directorate of the Dramatic Guild announce their entire satisfaction with the progress of rehearsals for Androcles and the Lion," a comedy-satire by G. B. Shaw.

When interviewed by a Journal Reporter yesterday, Mrs. G. B. Reed, General Director of the Guild had some interesting news to reveal. For instance, in the Prologue Hazel O'Kilman as Megaera does the garrulous, hen-pecking wife stuff to perfection. Scarth MacDonnell as Androcles is an absolute natural! You should see that lad perform. Androcles and Megaera are contrasts in every way—voice, temperament, action, size—every-

Arts Concursus To Be Held Next Week

Court Clerk Orion Low has announced that the second sitting of the Arts Concursus will be held on Thursday and Friday, March 9th and 10th in Convocation Hall. The constables are scanning the law books of the University in order to be sure of their ground when they make arrests. Anyone wishing to give information on flagrant breaches of the law should see any member of the constabulary which includes Messrs. Conquergood, Bews, Gussow, Waugh, Jenkins, Major and Carr. As the present list of offenees is not a lengthy one, the court officials are willing to consider all cases with "potentialities."

Judge Alan Sprague will preside over the sessions and will be assisted by Doug. Muir. Max Rapoport has charge of the prosecution and is being aided by George Fletcher, the junior prosecuting attorney. Sheriff Chuck O'Neill has recently established a thriving business in frosh hats. He has informed the Journal that those hats which are not claimed hy the date the court sits will be auctioned off at the close of the session. If no bids are received the unclaimed hats will he donated to unemployed graduates.

"Monthly Jag" Out To - Morrow

"The Monthly Jag" will go on sale to-morrow morning at 9 a.m.," said the Editor of the new undergraduate magazine when interviewed this morning. "We have procured a staff of competent newsboys who will be posted at strategic points about the campus so that no one who wants a Jag need go without one. The price will be ten cents and as only six hundred copies of the Jag are being printed those wishing to secure a copy for the folks back home are advised to do so as soon as the first boys appear on the campus."

"Remind your readers that all Jag purchasers stand an equal chance of winning five dollars by being the first to hand in a complete solution of the Jag Saw puzzle," concluded the Editor, folding up his one-way ticket to Jchol.

J. S. WOODSWORTH

J. S. Woodsworth To Speak To-morrow

L.S.R. Brings Noted C.C.F. Party Leader

On Saturday evening in Convocation Hall, J. S. Woodsworth, M.P., will address a public meeting sponsored by the local League for Social Reconstruction. Mr. Woodsworth is leader of the new political party, the C.C.F.

The leader of the new party has had a distinguished and interesting career. A descendant of the Loyalists, he was born in Toronto and attended Oxford. Besides his eleven years in Parliament, he has been a minister, an editor, a social service worker, a lahor organizer, a dock-hand and a school teacher. He was arrested in 1919 at the time of the big strike in Winnipeg, but released without a trial.

In 1921 he was elected Labor member for Winnipeg North Centre. His brilliant intellect and keen tongue add much to the proceedings in the House of Commons, where he is the strongest advocate of free speech and freedom of association. His social vision and organizing ability make him one of the strongest influences in Canadian politics today.

It is expected that a large attendance will greet Mr. Woodsworth's lecture here.

To Present Comic Operetta On March 7

The peasant Comic Operetta of Bach, sponsored by the Levana Glee Club, is due for presentation next Tuesday evening, March 7th, in Grant Hall, at 8.15 p.m. Tickets are now on sale at 50 and 25 cents.

During the past week several dress rehearsals have been held and another is scheduled for this afternoon at 4 p.m.

The program is wide and varied. In commemoration of the centenary of the birth of Johannes Brahms and the semi-centennial of the death of Richard Wagner, two women's choruses featuring Wagner's "Chorder Knaben ans Parsifal," and Brahms' "When'er the Sounding Harp is Heard," will be given.

Then in the interim, before the Comic Operetta, a quartet of four violins (Misses M. Arbuckle, P. Gummer and Messrs. P. Miranti, P. Carlinsky) will be heard in a selection from Wagner's "Lohengrin."

Part II. is the comic operetta with ballet and orchestral accompaniment presenting a chorus of fifty voices. Mesdames Gilmour and Tracy will take the soprano solos; Messrs. Sparks and Percival the tenor and baritone parts, respectively.

Robertson Davies is the producer of this ambitious presentation. Professor H. L. Tracy will conduct, assisted by Mrs. A. R. B. Williamson at the piano.

Loyalty, Co-operation And Support Inculcated By Military Training

Committee For Prom Reports Ticket Sellout

Rumours are afloat that almost all the tickets for the Junior Prom. have been sold. With "something different" as a key-note it is bound to stand head and shoulders over anything of its kind this season. The La Salle ballroom has the appearance of a Formal with its glistening stars in an azure blue and Bob Warmington's popular band will furnish the music. There will be a twofold means of enjoyment during supper when entertainment extraordinary will accompany the repast. The favours are in a class by themselves and the committee feel that they will sufficiently climax the gala occasion.

Here is a deep, dark secret—"The Monthly Jag" will make its first appearance at the Prom., so bring along an extra dime. It promises to be a sensation.

Raeburn's Life And Work Lecture Topic

The life and work of the greatest of Scottish artists, Raeburn, were the subjects of an address by Dr. Thomas Gibson to members of the Kingston Art Association on Tuesday afternoon in the Douglas Library. The artist's early background of the Scottish border and his distinguished career in Edinburgh were set forth sympathetically and intimately by Dr. Gibson who also discussed many of Raeburn's most striking works and showed the influence upon them of the painting of other masters, especially Velasquez. Besides photographic reproductions a number of choice slides were shown which had been loaned for the occasion by the Art Gallery of Toronto and the National Gallery.

This was the sixth in the series of illustrated lectures arranged this season by the Executive of the Association. A seventh has been announced, "Photography as Art", by Dr. G. B. Frost of the Chemistry Department at Queen's, who, already known as a musician, is also an artist in photography.

Training Equips Men Declare Speakers At C. O. T. C. Gathering

Loyalty, co-operation and support—these are the three great lessons which a military training can give a man, and they are lessons which may be applied in any walk of life. This was the tenor of the speeches at a most successful dinner held by the Sergeants' Mess of the Q.U.C., C.O.T.C.

After the Toast to the King, which was proposed by C.S.M. J. Marriot, the spirit of the company was roused by the community singing, conducted by Col. A. B. Henderson, accompanied by W. F. Gummer.

Following upon this Sgt. T. Lindsay proposed in a few well chosen words a toast to the guests.

This was replied to by Major D. G. Jemmett in the absence of Dr. W. H. Fyfe. Major Jemmet in his preliminary remarks said that he had been called at the last moment and that he felt rather like Malvolio in Twelfth Night who had "greatness thrust upon him." The Major went on to thank the Mess most cordially for an excellent dinner, and then branched off into nautical subjects. He explained how the Yacht Club had recently purchased new dinghies. In order to ensure that the maximum of speed be obtained from these boats, tests were necessary. These were impossible during the winter. He had therefore built a small model and shortly hoped to build a Wind Tunnel in Fleming Hall, if that building was not destroyed by fire. Major Jemmet added that possibly one or two $5 fines would help in the building of the Wind Tunnel. He closed by extending an open invitation to all those interested, to help him in his experiments.

There was a short interval during which C.S.M. Ranald Macdonald and Cpl. John Leitch piped "The Barren Rocks of Aden", and "Piobroeachd Dhonnuilldhui."

C.S.M. Marriot in proposing a Toast to Headquarters, voiced the appreciation of the O.T.C. for the time which certain of the Headquarters staff had devoted to the Corps. He remarked that those men were greatly valued whether they merely

Progress In Medicine

The human in its workings produces some abrasive substance which rapidly dulls the bright face of novelty. There is nothing new for long under the sun. We used to drive a car from the showroom to the street and during the few seconds necessary for that trip, metamorphose the machine into a second-hand one; in these days, of course, all trace of newness is efficiently removed by former owners long before we get the car. As with automobiles, so it is with other things. Any object or principle with which we have become even slightly familiar is old in our eyes. So completely new a being as a baby soon ceases to excite wonder, unless it is the sole accomplishment of its parents.

Those people who remember the events and conditions of forty years ago—and there are many such people alive—should be able to look back to the introduction of many new things. Why is it that during those years the mortality rate of diphtheria has been reduced to one tenth of its former figure? Because of the diphtheria antitoxin now distributed free by the Ontario and other provincial governments. And ten years ago a large percentage of scarlet fever cases developed disabling sequelae after the attack. Dangerous complications are now seldom seen and even the present attenuated form of scarlet fever is "the prerogative of those who wish to have it", as Lord Sydenham said of smallpox, because preventive treatment with Dick toxin prevents it.

About 120 years ago Jenner instituted the system of vaccination against smallpox which is used to-day, greatly modified and improved of course. The results of such vaccination a century ago sometimes upset the calculations of the vaccinators and the vaccinated, and tales of the dangerous and ineffectual nature of the treatment have been handed down from those days to ours, losing nothing in the passing, so that there are still many people to be found who regard vaccination with a holy horror. The persistence of such ideas is the sole reason for the appearance of occasional cases and small epidemics in Canada, for smallpox cannot persist in a country where every person is vaccinated. "Science Service," quoted in the February "Diplomate," records some fifty notable advances in the field of medicine made during the year 1932. Here are a few of them:

A new pain-relieving drug was discovered, five times as potent as morphine, and without the latter's habit-forming quality.

Immunity to yellow fever is made possible by a new method, making use of mouse serum.

Soricin, derived from castor oil, was found to make harmless the poison of snake venom, as well as the intestinal toxins producing auto-intoxication.

Radiations from the human body strong enough to kill yeasts were reported.

All these were recorded in newspapers, of course, and were thus brought to the attention of millions of people—millions who saw, marvelled, and probably forgot. Not many years ago Insulin and Arsphenamine and Pitnitrin were marvels, gifts from the gods; now they are uninteresting patent medicines. To-day it seems hardly believable that a Swedish surgeon has stopped a human heart for several minutes to operate on it and has then seen his patient recover completely; in a few years such a feat will probably be commonplace.

Nothing remains new under the sun, but new things in constant procession grow old before man's weary eyes.

Who Teaches It?

It is surprising how many students prefer to study their instructors rather than their texts and how carefully they record their idiosyncrasies. This one will take so much apple-polishing; this one will not take any. This one is partial to men; this to women. This one's quizzes are always objective; this one's always the essay type.

Most students have a memorized list of professors with them when they go to enroll. They know which ones are "easy," and which they must avoid if it can possibly be done.

As soon as they begin the course they start to apply the information they have gathered about the instructor. From then on they watch him closely in order to add to the store of knowledge—about the instructor, not about the subject matter. They know if they need to listen in class or study the text. They soon discover what he likes and what he dislikes.

By the time the semester is over, most students know enough about their teachers to fill a book. As for the course itself—well—! —Daily Kansan.

To Think or Not to Think

To what extent are college students seriously puzzled about their future life work?

As many as seventy per cent of the graduates of 1931 in a representative number of colleges are still unemployed. Forty per cent of graduates of 1930 are still looking for jobs. Thousands of students now preparing for definite professions probably will never be able to find a place in their chosen profession so long as our present system of unplanned vocational economy exists. The Association of Unemployed College Alumni is adding new members fast.

It is no easy task to find one's place in the world. The vocations are tremendously overcrowded. This is a result not only of the fact that since the war colleges have been turning out more and more graduates each year, but also of the fact that the world's economic foundations have been crumbling beneath our feet. Our whole machine age and our past way of doing things is going through a vast metamorphosis. We of this generation are suffering because of it.

College undergraduates must learn to discover themselves and their real abilities more quickly and more surely than they have been doing in the past. They must discover what they can do better than anything else and specialize in that particular field. This does not mean simply building mouse-traps better than anyone else in the world, and that alone, for the world will make a path only to the door of the person who has a broad, cultured education and who realizes the interdependence of the people of the nation and the world.

Education For Business

Many years ago a young advertising writer had this experience.

He was reading, one night, the autobiography of Herbert Spencer. In one of the earlier chapters he read how Spencer, in his youth, had made an effort to improve certain common mechanical devices, but without success.

In one of these devices the very improvement Spencer sought had just been made, and the advertising writer was engaged in advertising it. Then and there, under the evening lamp, he wrote one of the most successful advertisements he ever produced, captioned "The Man Who Succeeded Where Herbert Spencer Failed."

This and many similar experiences, in which general knowledge became grist to his business mill, convinced him, he says, that education for business may be approached in too narrow a sense.

A similar view was expressed by a prominent Chicago alumnus when he set down, semi-humorously, these requisites for his son's business education: "A knowledge of the Bible, a mastery of accounting, skill in boxing."

The point is this: the best education for business is not to be found in an education for business; but is an education for a life to be spent in business.

It is not a matter of subjects, but a matter of viewpoint.

All subjects are part of the one Great Subject—the Art of Living. Accounting is not merely a set of mathematical rules for keeping books. Accounting deals with debits and credits—with which certain Angels are also said to deal. It deals with depreciation, maintenance and reserves, and all these are principles of living. You meet depreciation every time you have your shoes half-soled, and maintenance every time you have them shined.

Similarly, Business Law is part of man's technique for handling human relationships; and Business History part of the drama of mankind's adventures. Marketing is one of society's eternal problems; and Salesmanship is not a black art but a technique for getting minds to meet. Divinity students study it under the name of Homiletics.

The student who approaches his preparation for a business career with this understanding will not see his subject matter neatly docketed in pigeonholes. He will see that it runs out from the campus into every activity of living; that it runs back into the physical sciences, the biological and social sciences and the humanities of his earlier academic years; that it runs forward, without end, into a changing world.

As he studies, he will read outside as well as inside the labels on his courses; learning that a deep-plowed intellectual background is more to be sought than great riches; that it is out of that background great riches of every kind grow.

It is expected that in Session 1933-34 an exchange of students may be made with France. Applications will be received by the Registrar until March 15th from any students who wish to be considered. The student chosen will be placed in one of the French Lycées near a university as instructor in English. Board and lodging will be free but small university fees will be payable. Any further information desired may be obtained from the Registrar.

Alexander von Humboldt Foundation

The German Consul-General at Montreal invites applications for scholarships of the Alexander von Humboldt foundation. The scholarships afford free tuition at a German university or technical college for one year, and a monthly allowance of 110 Reichsmark (about $32 at the current rate of exchange). It is estimated that an additional sum of $10 to $15 a month will suffice for living expenses.

Applications for the academic session 1933-34 must reach the secretary of the Humboldt foundation not later than March 31st, 1933.

Candidates should possess the following qualifications:

(1) They must have completed their academic studies in their own country and must have an outstanding academic record. Testimonials from the applicant's professors will be required.

(2) They must either have already entered upon a career or else have a definite prospect of securing upon their return from Germany a position which will enable them to assist to an unusual extent in strengthening the intellectual and cultural relations between Germany and their own country.

(3) Their knowledge of the German language must be sufficiently good to enable them to profit by the lectures at a German university and to do research work.

Further information may be obtained from Professor Henel of the German Department or from the German Consul-General direct.

Orals in French

Oral examinations for all students taking French classes numbered 10 or over will be held during the last week of term. The exact date and time will be announced later.

Applications for Degrees

Applications, with fees, for all degrees must be received at the Registrar's Office on or before March 15th.

C.O.T.C. Training Of Value Through Life Say Speakers

occasionally offered up silent prayers for our well being or consigned us to the devil for our incompetace.

This toast was responded to by Major H. A. Campbell, who in his opening remarks, frankly admitted that the existence of the permanent force was due solely to the militia. He commended the spirit of the gathering and expressed a desire that the politicians of today should cultivate the same spirit of co-operation which one finds in the army.

Major Campbell said that there were three lessons to be learned. The first was that typically English characteristic — playing the game. The second was the subordination of one's own desires to the good of the whole, and the third lesson was the exercise of responsibility. He closed by thanking the Mess on behalf of Headquarters Staff for their tribute.

Music again filled the air and afterwards Col. A. MacPhail, in the absence of Licut.-Col. P.G.C. Campbell, proposed a Toast to the Corps.

"There is no toast in the world which I would rather propose than that to the O.T.C. In fact in a manner of speaking, I am the O.T.C." Thus spoke the Colonel.

He continued by tracing the history of the Corps from its inception in 1910, under his leadership as the 5th Field Co'y of Engineers. In 1914 it was broken up into many sections and flourished during the war providing much valuable material. Since 1918 the uphill fight has continued.

"The loyalty, said Col. MacPhail, was supreme, the opposition was great, but we stuck and here we are."

He conlinned by voicing as his opinion that war was unavoidable. It was essential, therefore to be prepared. The Colonel recalled that the pay of the 5th. Field Co'y in those early days was surrendered to the Foundation Fund for the building of Union.

He observed that the opposition in the University appeared to have diminished, but he assured the company that the University was opposed to the military spirit, adding, "You can take that or leave it, but it may interest you to know that practically every able-bodied male in an American College belongs to an O.T.C., while at Queen's this can be said of barely 10% of the male student body. Colonel MacPhail concluded by expressing the hope that he would live to see the day when Cadets would receive credit in their April exams. in recognition of time and energy given to the O.T.C.

Col. W. P. Wilgar then rose and responded to the toast. Among other things he remarked, "As I came into the hall tonight Major Clarke remarked to me, 'What a lot of bright faces!' An eminent member of the Mess interpeted 'Hear, Hear", audibly, whereupon the Colonel came back snappily with, 'He couldn't see you when he made that remark.'" (Laughter). Col. Wilgar thanked the N.C.O's for their help during the year and finished by saying that despite opposition he would like to see the Corps go on. The gathering sang, "For he's a jolly good fellow", after which Col. Wilgar again rose, saying "I see so many Scotsmen around me that to have that song sung for a mere Irishman is very touching indeed."

Capt. D. T. R. McColl then proposed a toast to the Mess.

Apropos of some remarks on the pipes he told this story: "A Scotsman lay in hospital nigh unto death. The doctor shook his head and said "Mac you better put yourself right with the world and your Maker." Then Mac said "Doc there's one thing I want before I die, I must hear the pipes." The doctor procured a piper and he started to play at 5 in the evening outside the windows of the ward. The next morning when making his rounds the doctor entered the ward expecting to find an empty bed. Instead, however, he found the Scotchman's temperature was normal, his pulse as it should be, his breathing regular . . . . but, all the others in the ward were dead."

R.S.M. Connor, Chairman of the Mess, responded to the toast. He was of the opinion that Tuesday's dinner was the best that the Mess had ever had. (It was only their third).

Sgt. Major Connor then addressed some remarks to the N.C.O's during the course of which he said: "Well, fellows, you've put me at the head of this show, but I keep on telling you that you ought to realize that it's your Mess." (Laughter). Connor is still trying to see the joke.

Lt.-Col. L. J. Austin then took the floor and humorously admitted his surprise at finding that when the song, "Pack up your troubles" was sung from the song sheet it was done so by the courtesy of a firm in New York.

Dr. Austin reviewed the subject of "The Medical Man in War" from Roman times to the present. "Records of those early days are practically nil," he said. Then he traced the rise of medicine to the Crusades with the Knights Hospitallers and Templars, until he came to the 10th century, and a Frenchman named Ambrose Paré. This surgeon was the first to replace the red-hot iron by a form of ligature. He introduced many other reforms, and left voluminous writings on the subject.

Doctor Austin then mentioned two more Frenchmen who were pre-eminent in this field in the 18th century. They were the Duke of Guise and Baron Larrey. At this time we get the first mention of trench feet, and moving ambulances. Coming to the present day Doctor Austin said that war now required a trained surgeon to every 25 men, although this was never actually possible. He said that during the Great War the surgeons worked with one enormous advantage in their favour. They were operating many miles away from parents.

Major H. B. Clarke concluded the programme with some reminiscences of the Western Front. He stressed the fact that hatred on both sides in the front line was practically non-existent and that it got more bitter the further away one got from the front line. With the singing of "Auld Lang Syne," and "God Save the King" the party broke up. It may be safely said that "a successful evening was had by all."

The thanks of the Mess are due to Lt.-Col. P. G. C. Campbell for kindly supplying the wine, and to W. C. Macdonald Inc., for the cigarettes.

Great credit is due to Sgt. Galt and his committee for the time and energy which they expended on making the dinner a success.

The guests were:—Lt.-Col. W. P. Wilgar, Lt.-Col. L. J. Austin, Major H. B. Clarke, Capt. J. Macdonald, Colonel A. MacPhail, Major H. A. Campbell (Headquarters), Major D. M. Jemmett, Major R. O. Earl, Major G. S. Melvin, Capt. D. T. R. McColl, Sr. Under Officer Drury (R.M.C.), Lieut. R. Low, W. P. Doolan (P.W.O.R.), R.S.M. I. Dryden, S.M. I. Driscoll, W. K. Gummer.

Students Lauded In Imaginary Interview

"The college student of today is an alert, peppy, up-to-the-minute person," said Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt in an imaginary interview granted in the Daily today. Governor Roosevelt will be inaugurated president of the United States in a few months, according to rumors reported here.

"I place my hopes and beliefs in college students. In fact, so much do I believe in them, that I am planning to take a few of them away from their books and lectures and place them in office at Washington as soon as the opportunity permits," continued the governor, we hope.

You see, the enterprising reporter had lots of ambitions and an editor, but no enterprise. So, being tired of asking comical co-eds and flippant frosh about cozies and plays —football and otherwise—we decided to imagine an interview with a real big shot. Frankie the Fearless was a good subject, so we hope no one will mind.

"I have been delighted in my visit here at Northwestern. The girls are mighty pretty. My idea of a beautiful girl is a wholesome girl. She must weigh at least 135 pounds, wear her hair off her forehead and behind her ears ,and dress simply and in bright colors," believes Roosevelt. "Ears show character and the forehead shows intelligence.

"I feel that students here should be given more opportunity to relax," he said. "As I look about the campus the only thing that spoil the youthful spirit are the tense looks on people's face—and too many books.

"Personally I feel that chewing gum is a good way to relax. If we only had more time to sit before the fire and chew gum-" he declared.

"When I'm president . . ." he began. And the great man heaved a great sigh in a big way. "But what's the use . . . you're only making all this up anyway. Well, come back in about five years, and I'll give you a real interview."

—Daily Northwestern.

Weekly Board Plan Mooted At Oregon

Interest in the co-operative living plan for students on the Oregon campus was evidenced recently by approximately 10 students who called Dean Virgil D. Earl in search of further information on the project. The dean signified that while no definite plans had been formulated, he would be glad to aid in bringing students together who might join the undertaking.

Along the line of meals for the groups, a menu of three meals a day for one week was drawn up by the home economics department with the idea of providing a balanced ration, variety, and of keeping cost as low as possible. It provided for four adults at a total cost of $6.17 for the week.

Daily Cost Low

The average daily cost of the food for each person, according to the budget, would be 22 cents. Foodstuffs quoted at low prices predominate in the menus. The largest single item is for milk. Other commodities used extensively are apples, carrots, spinach, potatoes, eggs, butter and bread.

Several students who read the menu commented that, while lacking some of the frills, it compared favorably with fraternity fare. Careful planning and proper preparation would keep the plain food from becoming monotonous, it was believed.

Dean in Favor

"I am heartily in favor of doing anything that will aid students in getting their educations," was the comment of Dean Earl. "Last winter and spring this office attempted to get several students started in a co-operative project. Only about 12 were really interested, however."

It is believed that the greater financial stringencies have induced a larger number of students to become interested in such a project and that it will prove fairly popular. The significant part is that it was men who made the inquiries yesterday, while those taking part in the project last year were all women.

Heredity

Heredity is science of effortless acqnisition from parents. Sometimes its workings involve the transmission of money, but much more frequently it is concerned with the reproduction of traits of character, and especially unpleasant traits. Genius is not hereditary. This is undoubtedly a wise dispensation of providence, which has saved humanity endless trouble, but it must be a saddening thought to some of us nevertheless.

Popular opinion has frequently followed the theory that there are many hereditary diseases. Actually there are few. Tuberculosis, for instance, has been widely regarded as a family taint, while as a matter of fact, it is very rarely actually congenital. It is possible however, that one child may inherit a lesser degree of resistance against tuberculosis than another, and it is now well known that the disease may be readily transmitted from one member of a family to another, so that a parent may infect a child after birth.

In the cases of some other diseases, the child actually inherits a temporary immunity, a free gift from the parent which helps him through the hazardous first year.

The transmission from generation to generation of physical characteristics appears to be governed by set rules. The biology scholar may use his knowledge of Mendel's laws to predict the colour of a baby's eyes, provided he be in possession of definite knowledge concerning the iris pigments of the baby's eight great grandparents, as of course he is not. Distinguishing physical variations are very frequently reproduced in the offspring. Tendencies to tallness, high or low body weights, baldness, the easy contraction of infections or resistance to them, large ears and ingrowing toe-nails are frequently found in people whose parents were similarly blessed or afflicted. Facial features are also passed on, unfortunately, long noses seem to be a more or less dominant characteristic, as do multiple thumbs. Other features, on the other hand, are believed to be acquired in early childhood, through parental associations. Wagging chins are examples.

Heredity is often saddled with blame which could be more justly placed elsewhere. That a boy should have poor teeth in common with his father does not indicate an inheritance of bad teeth; it probably means only that his childhood diet was deficient as was his fathers. So may malformations of bone or poor development of muscle or dullness of memory be due at times to improper feeding and training in the early months and years of life rather than to congenital defects. Few children are reared as carefully as race-horses or performing seals. The child inherits complete set of muscles and an aggregation of brain cells, but the development and co-ordination of these are post-natal affairs. No baby, however well endowed, can ride a bicycle or read a newspaper.

Human beings develop mental and physical characteristics different from those of their parents, but there is a norm to which the race seems to be inevitably brought back by hereditary factors. It is not surprising then, that sons of great men seldom attain greatness. The genius, like the man of extraordinary physical development, is a sport, and it is natural that his descendants should differ from him as his forbearers did.

Recognition of the importance of environment influences has deprived the principles of heredity of some following, but those principles can never be left out of any sociological calculation, for a high type of individual may no more rise directly from a low one than a bone can come out of an oyster stew.

Meds '34 Plan Celebration At Hotel La Salle, March 17

St. Patrick's Day has come to be synonymous with a Meds '34 Year Dance, and this year will see no exception for the year again extends a hearty invitation to its friends to make whoopee on that date at the La Salle.

A committee of social veterans composed of George Elliott, Jack Baker, Leo Limoges and Bob Ralph has been quietly planning for weeks to make the evening an outstanding event. They announce that all features of a good dance, favors, novelties, music by Warmington and other attractive numbers will add to the enjoyment of this year's party.

May we remind those who intend doing, that everybody just naturally steps out on St. Patrick's evening and therefore tickets should be picked up early. Last year tickets were all sold one week prior to the dance, and many were disappointed.

Tickets will cost $1.50 for a long and happy evening and can be secured from the above committee or from any member of the year. The sale will be limited to ninety only and that means ninety.

It cannot be doubted that the modern Christian has much to learn from the early, idealistic Pagan. If an inquisitive newspaper reporter could by chance, find himself transported back into the early days of the Roman Empire, he might overhear the following kind of a conversation on a street corner—

Nicias: Hast ever thought, O Amycus, how differently men carry themselves beneath the burdens which Life hath put upon them?

Amycus: Yea, that I have. But say on, friend, for when thou dost deign to discourse in that vein, thou hast the mood to talk, and may I be the last to withstand thee.

Nicius: And that the weight of the burden they carry hath naught to do with it?

Amycus: How so?

Nicias: Because one who hath been most heavily weighted may carry his burden most easily; the while another, who hath naught to carry that would fret a healthy child, doth stagger and stumble and ever complain of his grievous load.

Amycus: It is wealth and position and health that make burdens easy.

Nicias: Nor wealth nor position nor even health. Thou hast known men of wealth whose gold did but tighten their purses and deepen their wrinkles. Thou hast known men of high position who could not enjoy so much as a loaf of bread and a cup of wine with their friends. Thou hast known men of the health and strength of an ox who did most constantly sigh and halt as if they could scarce put one foot before another.

Amycus: Mayhap, but what dost thou make of that?

Nicias: That the strength of life is the strength of the spirit. That the joy of life is the joy that cometh from within and never from without. That the burden weighteth heavily only on him whose back is bowed with his own dispirit. Man hath that within him which will bring him victory with the gods if he but give it feet to run and wings to fly withal. It is of this the gods are born. It is this which doth vanquish a thousand evil spirits of ill fortune and defeat. If thou wilt live on this, thou canst not meet with disaster though the Fates beat thee at every throw of the dice.

Amycus: Brave words, my Nicias! Brave words and true!

McGill On Look Out For Notorious Thief

MONTREAL — All visitors to the McGill University Libraries and Museums are being subjected to a careful scrutiny these days for a certain internationally known art thief has been seen hovering about the grounds and the curator has warned anybody of thieving tendencies to give the college a wide berth.

While on the subject of art thieves, F. Lionel Judah, the curator, gave some of his experiences with the art stealing fraternity three of whom paid their unwanted attentions to the University in the past.

The first works with his wife and is a specialist in old books and manuscripts. He is known to the authorities so well that on his last visit to Montreal in October he did not put in his appearance at McGill.

The second is a Dutchman with a very comprehensive knowledge of art treasures and antiques of value. Armed with the ability to judge the value of an object he seldom goes wrong in his selection of objects to be stolen.

The last of the three is the most dangerous of the lot, and was once caught stealing goods from the enthnological museum. He was apprehended leaving through a window after having gained admittance by means of a very plausible though false story. This man's record shows that he was once ejected from England as an undesirable. Once, as a salesman of expensive books, he almost succeeded in duping McGill professors. At another time, registered as a student, he was found in the possession of about forty valuable books.

Mr. Judah explained that all museums on the continent report any thefts immediately, in order to make it more difficult for the thief to dispose of the stolen goods. An example of the expediency of this practice was given by Mr. Judah. Forty or fifty years ago a giant auk's egg was tolen from the museum of the old Natural History Society, since taken over by McGill. A warning was immediately sent out, but the egg has never been reported.

There is danger in using that slogan. "Buy American," these days. Some country with a little money left might mininterpet it for "Buy America" and go ahead and do it.—Texas State Lass-O.

thing, a great big Megaera who shouts and whines alternately and a meek, quiet little man, with a weakness for Christianity and animals, who talks baby-talk to a lion. And speaking of lions—you'll never see a lion to equal Audy's. Never in the history of stage and screen has there been a pussy who could surpass the roars and capers of this one. He even overshadows our friend of the M-G-M studios.

As Lavinia, Lebo Ware is developing her rôle to perfection as usual. Art Sutherland as the Captain is excellent. In our opinion he's got a good part and is showing a performance which will far surpass his previous excellent reputation. The rôle of the fanatic reformer, Ferronius, taken by Horatis Todd is developing to unexpected proportions. Mr. Todd is an absolute find, they say. When he loses that temper of his and goes berserk in the martyr rôle there isn't a member of the cast who doesn't quake with real fear. Erskine Morden, as the Editor, although in a minor rôle is justifying his existence as usual. Mrs. Reed hinted that friend Morden is a born actor!

AT THE CAPITOL

THE ISLAND OF LOST SOULS
with
Charles Laughton, Leila Hymans, Bela Lugosi.

The Island of Lost Souls as a "horror" runs true to type. It has the usual setting on a lonely island, a castle, strange sounds, strange people, and the incomparable Bela Lugosi. It is better than the average, due to the fact that instead of merely one monstrosity there are several hundred inexpressibly horrible ape-like creatures who emit at intervals either high falsetto barks or deep growls.

The story, based on a novel by H. G. Wells, is about a scientist who experiments in creating men from animals. The Panther Woman (need we say more) is his most perfect creation. Edmund Parker, a castaway on the island, is retained as a captive, in order that the scientist may see the Panther Woman's reaction to a man. (Incidentally, although the censors do their best, she reacts very well). Parker's fiancée comes to find him, and pursued by blood thirsty monsters, they make their escape through the jungle. One simply writhes with excitement and horror.

Charles Laughton as the scientist, undoubtedly steals the picture. For years an actor on the London stage, he is one of the most finished on the screen.

Any one who enjoys a good blood-curdling picture should not miss this. B++

AT THE TIVOLI

MY WIFE'S FAMILY
with
Gene Gerrard, Muriel Angelus and others

If "My Wife's Family" is to be used as a criterion for English pictures I'm afraid that the British film business has got to travel a long way to equal Hollywood.

Gene Gerrard and Muriel Angelus play the leads in the little farce which is entertaining in spots—but many yawns between the few good spots. Their movements are too stiff and stagey, and the scenes that might have been funny are too overacted.

At any rate Gerrard plays the role of the doting husband until the mother-in-law and rest of the family are welcomed to his household. He then pretends to go mad because of his mother-in-law's incessant nagging — (the mad part is very convincing, at least it will drive you mad). Many dubious complications arise in which everyone is implicated from the head of the house down to the maid. The old game of "who's child is that" is then played. When the hen-pecked father-in-law gets a little drunk and begins to assert his authority, you probably will be amused—at least you will love seeing mother-in-law put in her place.

The shorts are very good and if you're a good stolid Englishman you'll like "My Wife's Family." C.

"Matrimonial quarrel ends in wreck," states a newspaper. He probably put his foot down for once and forgot it was on the gas feed.—Baker Orange.

Book Chats

By R.M.

THE GAP IN THE CURTAIN
By John Buchan
Hodder & Stoughton, London, 1932

To those who have been intrigued and entertained by John Buchan's earlier books, especially those which made him internationally known, such as "The Thirty-Nine Steps", "Green Mantle", "The Three Hostages", and "Castle Gay", this latest work will prove somewhat of a disappointment. Buchan's prose style, a heavy and obvious stolidity flirting puckishly with mysticism, made him quite popular among readers in the early twenties after the war, when the world was trying to conceal its horrible side under a forced gaiety. Now the vogue for writers like John Buchan has rather passed, just as the class of whom he loves to write, the rich landed gentry and aristocratic society of London, have passed. The younger generation have gone far beyond Buchan now in their literary tastes and have split into the two schools of ultra realism and ultra-idealism. His main admirers now are those of an older generation who look back longingly to the gay security and undisturbed prosperity of upper class Edwardian England.

The story opens at one of those tedious country-house week-end parties that seem the standard plot for most English novels, and it begins at dinner, which also seems quite characteristic. The person telling the story, a sententious old lawyer, is one of a group of six guests used in an experiment by the eccentric Professor Moc, who is taking flights into the realms of the metaphysical Hereafter from the solid earth of higher science. By following the Professor's training schedule, and receiving a vital mental force from him,—in the course of which incidentally, the Professor passes on forever into the hereafter himself — five of them are given a glimpse for one second of the pages of the London 'Times' of one year later. One reads of a big business merger, another of a drastic shift in politics, a third of a trip to South America, while the other two read announcements of their own deaths. The rest of the book is divided into five chapters, each telling how one of the five spent the intervening year and made use of the knowledge he had gained. Had the stories of all five been interwoven in one chronological sequence working up to the climax at the critical date one year later, the impression would have been stronger.

The story is written in the first person singular, which tends always towards incoherence and lack of form unless very skilfully used, which is not the case here. The narrator is one of the group in the experiment, and yet reiterates monotonously that he was merely a spectator. He is hurried about from place to place to be present at the opportune moment when the victim being described wishes to confide all his sorrows, fears and hopes, and long apologetic explanations are given as to why he happened to be there. Incidents are wrenched into place to make the whole seem logical, but Buchan seems to lack the fund of ornamental speech to cover up his laboriously constructed framework in plausible guise. Instead it is told in the bald prose of a scientific treatise, which may suit the temperament of the narrator, but is not conducive to a readable story. The few long chapters of unbroken narrative with no dialogue grow wearisome, while all subterfuge is abandoned in spots to give detailed descriptions of scenes the narrator could never have known.

Mr. Buchan evidently tried to make his five characters a cross-section of English upper-class society, as they include a financier, two politicians, a book commissioner, and a man-about-town. It is a plot with immense possibilites, although fantastic in conception.

The first half of the book is exceedingly dull. A long chapter on British politics is as utterly incomprehensible as a treatise on the gueiss deposits of the neolithic age. The last three chapters, however, provide more interest, and it is here that Buchan becomes more natural and animated. The story of Goodeve's year of grace, before the death revealed to him in the experiment comes, is very skilfully and dramatically told, tracing the course of his inherited morbidity during the year until he actually dies of his own fear of death.

The author's attempt at an epigram in every other sentence leads to a series of futile platitudes like "I must have been very tired, for I was getting as full of silly prejudices as a minor poet," which do more to obscure the slight plot than to make it intelligible and interesting. All the characters are woven into a network of upper-class sport and society entirely alien, and slightly distasteful in their smug complacency, to most of the present generation.

In One Ear

By Outis

What other people are talking about is always of great interest to everyone. With this thought in mind "Outis" walked from the Students' Union to the New Arts Building about the noon hour one day recently, and listened, just listened.

* * * *

A well known social butterfly of the allegedly strong sex was telling his companion about the dance the night before. "What a girl," he was overheard to say. "And can she dance?"

* * * *

"And he assigned another essay this morning," a short, dark, fuzzy-haired, bespectacled student explained.

* * * *

"Did the Faculty Players feel sick after that ——", a prominent member of the Dramatic Guild was saying.

* * * *

"The A. B. of C. wasn't going to let them go to Oshawa," a hockey enthusiast asserted.

* * * *

"Watch me go for that $5.00 prize offered by the Jag." This from one of the well-known student gamblers.

"Yea, I saw the Doc this morning. I told him I couldn't pay the rest of my fees for another month," explained one of the "boys about town."

* * * *

"An I laughed, and I laughed, and I—" the professor was saying.

* * *

"I hope Mickey takes me to the dance to-night," a worried looking co-ed said.

* * * *

"I think he's marvellous," a tall, blonde, rather skinny co-ed told her companion.

* * * *

"What a break to make before a girl," a student said in a tone denoting anything but regret.

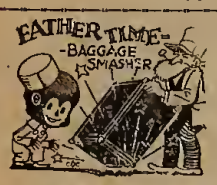
"She was quite plastered," another student was overheard to say.

* * * *

"I had to borrow two bits for lunch to-day. My cheque should have been here days ago." The fellow looked worried.

* * * *

"The little cat! Did you see the dirty look she just gave me?" The peppy little brunette seemed terribly angry.



* * * *

"Outis" just walked along, and listened. Listened.

The husband who used to bribe his wife into giving the house a good cleaning, now slyly slips a couple of pieces of her favorite jig-saw puzzles into his pocket.

HOCKEYISTS SUFFER ANOTHER REVERSE

Red Jackets Defeat Juniors Decisively

Queen's faded from the Junior O.H.A. play downs at Oshawa when the local youngsters dropped an 8-0 game to the fast travelling Red Jackets of Newmarket. It may sound foolish to say that it was a good game, but that's just exactly what it was, sixty minutes of mighty interesting hockey. The Collegians gave all in an effort to avert a shut-out and though they pierced the Red defence on several occasions, lady luck failed to smile on them.

Newmarket tallied three in the first period, two in the second and three in the third. In the last stanza Queen's determined offensive had the Tanners badly worried and the latter resorted to the age old custom of shooting the puck down the ice.

Midway through the second stanza Don James, Queen's brilliant goaler was struck over the eye with a bullet-like drive from Peterson's stick. He was knocked out completely and the game halted while "Johnny" McNab put on the pads. It was no easy breech to fill but Johnny never faltered and made many fine saves.

Newmarket again hit on all six and worked like a well-oiled machine. Possibly Peterson was outstanding in this contest, though Kelly, McArthur and Mann were not far behind in the matter of providing spectacular hockey.

"Johnny" Wing was again Queen's star, and how he missed scoring a couple of goals will always remain a mystery.

Until painfully injured in the second period Don James gave his usual high-class display of net minding, while McNab performed splendidly in the relief role. Other Queen's performers worthy of special mention were Bryden, Lewis and Bain.

The game was cleanly played and was capably handled by Johnny Mitchell of Hamilton.

Line-up:

Queen's:		Newmarket:
James	Goal	Farder
Smith	Defence	Vail
Haffman		Doran
Wing	Centre	Huggins
Gibson	Wings	Peterson
Lewis		Kelly

Cadets Take Game By Narrow Margin

In the final scheduled game of the local Intermediate Intercollegiate series Queen's dropped a hard fought battle to R. M. C. 5 to 4. The Tricolor took an early lead of two goals but the Cadets fought back tenaciously and snatched the verdict with only two minutes left to play. It was an interesting contest all the way and was productive of every kind of hockey; occasional bursts of speed and snappy combination efforts mixed with plenty of hard body checking and hickory wielding. For Queen's, Forsythe in goal, Johnny Wing, Patterson, Jimmy Arthurs and Bryden were the most conspicuous. Wing and Bryden recruited from Junior ranks made a creditable debut in the higher series.

Irvin, Monette and Kelly were best for R. M. C.

Queen's tallied after four minutes of play when Arthurs slapped home a pass from Patterson while two minutes later Marin netted McDonald's rebound. The Cadets rallied and Forsythe was forced to save many hard drives. Patterson went through twice but on each occasion the Red goaler outguessed him. Near the end of the period with Queen's playing two men short Irvin worked his way out of the corner to tally R.M.C.'s first goal.

Thirteen minutes in the second frame had elapsed before Monette tied it up. Forsythe stopped the shot but the disc rolled over the edge of his stick. It was a tough break as he had made plenty of smart saves on shots that were far harder to handle. Queen's went in to the lead shortly before the stanza ended when Kostuik counted on Bryden's nice pass from behind the nets.

The last period was the most interesting of the night. Peck knotted the count again after two minutes play when he batted the rubber in from a scramble. The Red Coats took the lead on another unfortunate break for Forsythe, Monette shot one from the Blue line and the Tricolor net guardian never saw it till the red light flashed. A couple of minutes later Johnny Wing went all the way alone and once more the score was tied. With less than two minutes left to play Peck notched the winning counter after a combination play with Blanchard.

Line up:

Queen's—Goal, Forsythe; Defence, McDonald, Kostuik; Centre, Arthurs; Wings, Carr, Patterson; Subs, Wing, Bryden, Marin, Murphy, Shephard.

SPORTS SLANTS

Hockey for this year ended rather ingloriously on Wednesday when the Senior "B" team dropped a 5 to 4 verdict to the Cadets.

* * * * * *

At that the game was probably the most interesting to watch of the year. The seniors, aided by a few of the juniors, put on a real exhibition and were only beaten in the final few minutes.

* * * * * *

The Junior basketeers took a battle from the local Y. by a decisive score, but the victory does not mean that they are still in the running. They have one more game to play with K.C.V.I. before calling it a season.

* * * * * *

The Intermediate basketball team is sitting pretty on top of the local heap, and also has one more game to play with Y.M.C.A. They may decide not to continue further in the O.B.A. playdowns.

* * * * * *

Rumors are rife about a few high class puckchasers who are figuring on coming to Queen's next winter. A strong Alumni could aid not only hockey but rugby teams if they were wide awake.

Sports Views

Only two basketball games are scheduled in the Senior Intercollegiate this week-end, McGill making the two day trip to play in Toronto to-night and in London to-morrow.

Although they have the championship safely tucked away the Red team will be very anxious to keep their record of Intercollegiate successes intact, and they will be doing their stuff in earnest in both towns. At that they should win without much trouble for they have proven themselves to be vastly superior to the other teams.

A feature this year in Senior Basketball will be the playoff between McGill and McMaster University for the college title. It will be recalled that the latter university together with R. M. C. and O. A. C. of Guelph formed a Senior "B" group, and that the winner of this group could challenge the Senior "A" winner for the title. While McMaster will undoubtedly challenge McGill, their hopes of whipping the Montreal team must be considered very slim.

With the playing of Wednesday's hockey game with R. M. C. Queen's teams are finished for the season. The only bright spot of the campaign was the playing of the Juniors, who showed a fairly well balanced team, backed by plenty of courage.

Interfaculty hockey remains to be played and while Arts and Science have finished their inter-year series, the Meds are still lagging, and have a few games to play. It is planned to finish the games this week and then have the Interfaculty battles next week.

While Queen's Juniors took the very short end of an 8 to 0 count at Oshawa, the game was far from being the one-sided affair that the score indicates. Such a decisive score surely indicates a runaway game for the winning team, but as in the first game here, Queen's battled desperately and made the Newmarket players earn every goal they got.

It was unfortunate that James was injured in the final game of the season, but the nasty cut he suffered in the eye region, happily missed doing serious damage. McNab got his big chance in the nets when James was forced to retire and he played a good game. It was no cinch stepping into the middle of a play-off, and have to face sharpshooters of the Newmarket type but he filled the bill.

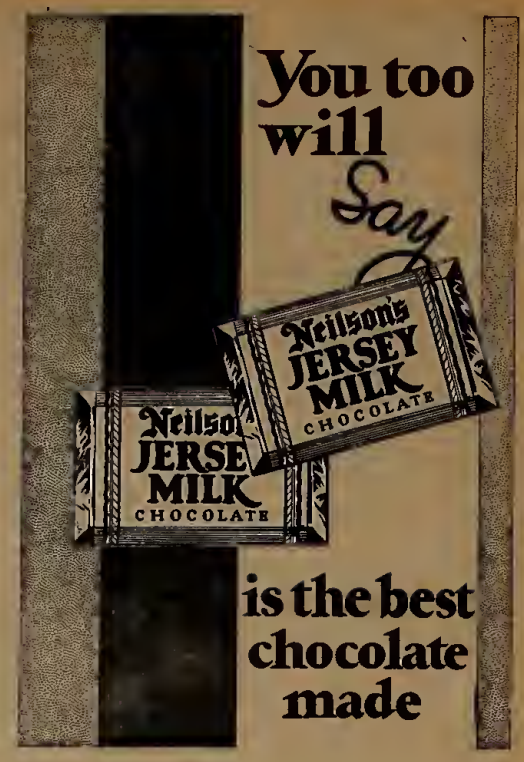
Johnny Wing was perhaps the unluckiest player of the series. He worked harder than any two players and should have had a goal or two in the first game. At Oshawa his dirty luck continued and while he got into position on numerous occasions, the net could not be dented.

All the boys can tuck away their equipment with the knowledge that they carried Queen's name along the road to the farthest point possible, considering the opposition.

The Kingston branch of the Alumnae Association is entertaining this year's graduates at tea in Ban Righ Hall on Saturday afternoon. Invitations have been sent to all members of Levana '33 who are listed in the Students' Directory but the Association wishes to include in the invitation all the members of Levana who are graduating this year and extends to them a cordial invitation to attend the tea.

Bernard Shaw Receives 1420 Invitations For Coming Visit

New York—Twenty more invitations to address meetings, broadcast, make news reels and play the lion generally and George Bernard Shaw, if he devotes one minute to each, will find the 1440 minutes of his stay in New York accounted for when he lands here from the Canadian Pacific liner Empress of Britain next April.



Up to the time the world cruise liner left Bombay for Colombo, Shaw had received 1420 invitations from New York organizations. So far as is known he has accepted only one, that of the Political Society.

Should he decide to accept more, Mayor O'Brien, as one Irishman to another, would probably give him a motor-cycle escort, but even that attention could not make it possible for G.B.S. to accept all his bids. He would wear out too many good Irish policemen. If he has any time for diversion Shaw will have a chance to see himself as others see him at the Times Square Theatre where Frederick Worlerk impersonates him in the play "Fools-cap."

With characteristic Shavian gesture, Shaw, who left England December 15 for New York, is circling the globe to get here. The Empress of Britain, white world-cruising liner, is due here at noon, Tuesday, April 11, and sails for Southampton at noon the following day.

Graduates' Marriages Show Less Failures

Although one out of every six marriages in the United States is ending in divorce, a recent study of marriages of couples who met while attending co-educational institutions indicates that not more than one in seventy-five results in failure.

The statement is quoted from a report recently issued by Dr. Paul Popenoe, director of the Los Angeles Institute of Family Relations. It is interesting from several points of view, but when studied for a moment, is not at all surprising.

On the university campus of to-day the sexes are engaged in a social and intellectual competition which provides opportunities for each to observe character traits and intellectual capacities in the other. Marriages founded upon mutual appreciation are indeed likely to prove most permanent.

But in addition, the university-trained man and woman is possessed of a greater knowledge of psychology and of the factors that determine human personality traits than is the untrained individual. It is knowledge that makes for tolerance and adjustment between husband and wife. Further, the college student of to-day secures from his studies in the social and the biological sciences a greater social stability, a greater amount of technical knowledge, and a wider conception of eugenic principles than are possessed by the average man or woman who has not pursued university study.

In spite of these things, however, it would seem that the modern university might more specifically attack this problem of intelligent and rational marriage than it is doing at present. The increased knowledge occasionally secured by the student on such matters which has been mentioned above, is merely a by-product of studies pursued for other purposes; we know of only one university that offers any especially designed course bearing on this topic.

College curricula have progressed far from the original three R's, and to-day include courses dealing with every field from practical vocational matter to highly scholastic and very impractical classical and cultural branches of learning. During this evolution there has been an ever-increasing emphasis placed upon the social sciences and their related fields.

At the same time there has been founded a number of special institutes and foundations concerned with family relations and the problem introduced into society by the newer conceptions of birth control and the increased knowledge of eugenics.

It is reasonable to expect from the universities of the country a reflection of this increased knowledge and enlightened point of view in their curricula if these universities are to fulfill their function of adequately training the young person for participation in the modern society of which he shortly becomes a part.

If university students are to be carefully schooled in the arts of writing, religion, language, literature, and philosophy, in the sciences of medicine, chemistry, physics and mathematics, in the vocations of agriculture, business, law and teaching, why should they not be as carefully trained in that one item of human relations which will probably make or mar their whole future to a greater degree than any other? It is an aspect of human affairs still left largely to chance or instinct. The divorce mills of every civilized country give ample proof of the lack of success which chance or instinct have achieved as the bases of mate selection.—Chicago Daily Maroon.

To Establish Cancer Clinic In Kingston

"The establishmen of an active-treatment centre through the joint efforts of government, university and hospital in Kingston is an advanced step in cancer control in Ontario," declared Dr. John W. S. McCullough, chief inspector of health for Ontario, speaking of the Kingston Institute of Radio-therapy, which will be opened at Kingston General Hospital to-day.

"The Ontario Institute of Radio-therapy about to be opened in connection with the Kingston General Hospital will not only afford better opportunities for the undergraduate in medicine, but it is bound to prove of high value in early diagnosis, and of earlier and more successful treatment of the disease," continued Dr. McCullough.

Dread Diseases Controlled

"Thirty years ago the diseases which the public most feared were diphtheria, tuberculosis, and typhoid fever. Of these, typhoid in Ontario is rare, diphtheria has a mortality but one-ninth of that of pre-antitoxin days, and if the preventive measure for diphtheria (toxoid) were used, there would be few, or no cases of diphtheria. The death rate of tuberculosis has been cut in two.

"These results have been accomplished within a generation, by the application of new discoveries in medical science, by the use of well-known sanitary measures, and by the education of the public.

"With respect to each one of these three "dread' diseases, the public now has little fear. To-day cancer is the 'dread disease' but it is not too much to hope and prophesy that cancer too, will be conquered by medical science.

Cancer Will Be Controlled

"The medical profession and the public all over the world are now engaged in a war against cancer, similar to the successfully conducted war against the trio of diseases referred to. Similar methods of warfare in respect to cancer will have their effect. There must be education of the public, early recognition of the disease and early and effective treatment.

Early Diagnosis Essential

"The early recognition of cases of cancer depends upon the intelligence of the public and the skill of the family doctor who first sees the victim of cancer. The public will learn, just as it learned about tuberculosis, from the publicity given to the subject of cancer, namely, through pamphlets, lectures, the motion film, the radio, and particularly from the press. In Massachusetts, doctors sent 29 per cent. of all cases to the treatment centre, while the newspapers sent 45 per cent.; but of operable cases, the doctors sent 50 per cent. and the newspapers 31 per cent. All over the world is the lamentable story—'cases come for treatment too late.' The public must learn to watch for the early signs of cancer. These are 'lumps, bleedings, and unhealing sores.' These capital signs must ever be before the public. They are the signs which should immediately drive the person to the doctor.

"The active-treatment centres will also become centres for diagnosis. Possessed, as they will be, of the best of anxiliary means of diagnosis such as X-ray, transillumination, etc., the treatment centres will lend themselves to the discovery of many of the more obscure cases of cancer. Early diagnosis is perhaps the most important single element in the war against cancer.

"The Institute, as it becomes well and favorably known throughout the eastern section of Ontario, is bound to attract a wide range of cases. Its success will depend upon results, and the results in treatment will in turn depend upon the co-operation of members of the staff—upon the physicians, surgeons, pathologists, radiologists, and other services who have charge of the cases. There is no doubt of the quality of the staff of the Institute at Kingston. They have been well chosen. The men appointed have the highest qualifications and experience. The success of the Institute's operations will depend primarily upon the working hand-in-hand of the members of the staff in the interest of the patient with cancer.

Hope For The Cancer Patient

"The importance and urgency of the war against cancer cannot be denied.

"The disease is no respecter of persons. Study of its nature and cause are absorbing the best minds of the world, but thousands of reports have been accumulated, all tending to show that this disease of humanity is almost never hopeless; that cures have been obtained in seemingly the most futile cases, and that the greatest single obstacle to the improved treatment of the disease is the mental lethargy and hopeless attitude of the general public. This attitude will disappear as the results of treatment at the Institute has a valued career ahead of it and for the sake of suffering humanity alone, one wishes it the highest success."

STUDES GO DUTCH

New York, N.Y.—Since New York was once New Amsterdam, it is only reversion to historical type when its university students go "Dutch." A survey conducted by a student paper, the Daily News, has found that the system of the "Dutch treat" is universal in undergraduate circles, even when the male student is accompanied by his co-ed girl friend. This lack of economical gallantry can be understood when it is realized, as the survey points out, that the average student income is only eight dollars a week. After board has been paid there is only two dollars left for tobacco and car fare. Only what is left over can be spent on the girl friend. The Daily News estimates that this is never more than two and one half per cent., or 20 cents a week.

Arts '36 Year Dance Was Colorful Affair

A large crowd attended an extremely colourful and successful year dance held last Monday evening in Grant Hall by the members of Arts '36. The lighting effects, under the supervision of "Red" Ketchen, were highly complimented and added tremendously to the atmosphere created by "Bob" Warmington and his Hotel La Salle Orchestra. The rendition of the enchanting waltzes was beautifully intermingled with the strains of catchy fox-trots and novelty numbers. A very pleasing cushion-cover was awarded to the couple who won the spot dance and who, incidentally, forgot to mention their names. Rupert Dumbrille, rapidly gaining in popularity, sang several snappy numbers.

The novelty dance was an evening's entertainment and enjoyment in itself. Ballons of various hues floated slowly down the red, yellow and blue rays of spotlights, which caught and recaught the dim sihouettes of graceful and beautiful young ladies and their escorts swaying to the tuneful rythmn of Warmington's music. Paper hats, horns, umbrellas and streamers were distributed profusely.

The gallery was ideal for "peaceful meditation"; not a light was visible. When intermission arrived it was observed that about one-third of the dancers were seated high aloft with the radiant glow of Cupid's light plainly visible in their eyes.

The refreshments were of the first order, largely because of the hard work of Emmett Briceland, who spared no effort in arranging a tasty luncheon. The orange beverage, which was not diluted to the insipid state, was delightfully refreshing and available at all times.

L. Carlson, Alex. Deans, "Red" Ketchen, and Bob Echlin, as members of the committee, worked faithfully with many volunteer workers from the year to put over a great dance.

The patrons and patronesses were Dean and Mrs. Matheson, Doctor and Mrs. Rose, Miss W. Gordon, and Professor James A. Roy.

Junior Basketballers Beat Y.M.C.A. And Hold Place

Queen's juniors defeated the Y.M.C.A. juniors 44-26 on the Queen's gymnasium floor Wednesday night and kept very much in the hunt for the E. O. A. B. A. honors. Queen's, Napanee and K. C. V. I. are all bunched at the top of the standing and the remainder of the schedule will see some keenly contested games. Napanee have been defeated but once and are favorites to take the title.

The Tricolor last evening had little trouble in disposing of the Y. M. C. A. squad and at the end of the first half the score stood 20-9 in favor of Queen's. The Y. M. C. A. team made a better showing the last half and scored 17 points but the winners were still the superior team and counted 12 field goals in the seeond half.

Vivian, the Y. M. C. A. pivot was the high scorer for the losers and counted five field goals. His performance was eclipsed by McDiarmid and Simmons of Queen's, who eaeh scored six field goals.

Debating Society To Retire From League

It was decided at the Annual Meeting of the Political and Debating Union held on Wednesday in the Arts Building to withdraw from the Inter-University Debating League. The aim of the Society is to encourage and promote public speaking in the University and it was thought that this purpose could be served better by arranging debates with McGill and Toronto Universities. The seeretary was instructed to make the necessary arrangements.

The teams to represent the University next year will be chosen by a eommittee consisting of members of the Faculty and the President of the Union.

The problem of popularizing debating among the students was given eareful attention. President George Wallaee remarked that there were many good speakers at Queen's but that it was difficulty to get them to take an interest in debating. The meeting was agreed that every opportunity should be given for new members to engage in the activities of the Society.

An election of officers for the year 1933-34 was held with the following result: Honorary President, Principal Fyfe; President, John Parker; Vice-President, Eric H. Gilmour; Seeretary, H. A. McLearn.

Roosevelt Uses Old Bible

Hyde Park, New York, (UP)—Franklin D. Roosevelt will take the oath of office on the old tattered Dutch bible that has been in possession of his family since 1670, he revealed today. For generations this Bible was used to chronicle the births, marriages and deaths in the Roosevelt family.

It was packed for shipment to Washington today for use next Saturday afternoon.

"I took my oath of office twice as governor of the state of New York on that same Bible," he said.

Undergrads' Literary Compositions Read

Six undergraduates read poems and stories of their own composition at the English Club meeting, Wednesday afternoon.

Miss Margaret Leon was first with four poems entitled "Life's Philosophy," "Bermuda Breezes," "Steadfastness" and "Brown Baby." Several members of the club expressed their especial appreciation for the first and last poems.

Next R. U. Mahaffy read a short story of the Great Lakes, entitled "Stinson's Chance," which tells how a young deck-hand survived the petty persecution of his "mates" to show himself a man at a critical moment.

Roger Nunn followed with his poem "Daybreak in Camp" which received well-merited applause from those present.

A story of a "Mounty" who didn't yet get his man was read by J. D. Bateman, a contributor to the last issue of the Quill. Judging by the ovation of the club members his story was one of the most popular on the programme.

Then followed "Check mate" by Fred. Flynn, narrating of high-society life, intriguing platinum blondes and embarassing moments of love-making. The exotic beauty of the heroine made several of the males present gasp with appreciation.

Two poems by Howard Pammett "Nocturne" and "Moonrise" were well received. Color and imagery was used to advantage in the second poem.

Mrs. Eric Duthie rose to make some helpful criticisms at the conclusion of these readings. The consensus of opinion was with her when she expressed her liking for Miss Leon's "Brown Baby" poem, reminiseent of Blake. Mr. Bateman's story, in her opinion, was most artistically done. Roger Nunn's effort was commended, also Bob Mahaffy's story of inland sailing. She made some constructive criticism of Mr. Flynn's story and alluded to Mr. Pammett's two pomes.

What Mrs. Duthie most admired about the program, was the distinctly Canadian tone. All of the stories, she said, were worthy of being published. The president, John Grabb, thanked her for these suggestions and the meeting adjourned.

LEVANA SOPH COURT

All complaints regarding the eonduct of Freshettes must be in the hands of the Convener of the Soph Court, Mary Fraser, by Saturday noon. These eomplaints may be left at the College Post Office. There will be an important meeting of Levana '35 on Saturday at 12 o'clock in the Red Room. It is essential that all members of the year attend.

S.C.M. ELECTIONS

The annual meeting and election of officers for the S.C.M., held on Friday, resulted as follows:

Hon. Pres., Prof. S. M. Gilmour; President, O. Hall, Arts '34; Vice-Pres., A. Grant, Arts '35; Secretary, R. Nunn, Arts '33; Treasurer, L. Carlson, Arts '36.

The Levana hranch of the executive will remain in office until next fall, when elections will be held.

Socialism Is Solution For Present Problems Declares J. Woodsworth

Noted Radical Leader Sets Forth Views On Economic Difficulties

Speaking under the auspices of the local branch of the League for Social Reconstruction to a capacity audience in Convocation Hall, Saturday evening, J. S. Woodsworth, M.P., outlined his views on the present economic system in Canada.

The speaker declared that socialism must be the solution to the present economic problems, a form of socialism different from that in Europe, arising from the needs of the Canadian people. The Great War, it was maintained by Mr. Woodsworth was only an incident in a chain of development.

Since the Industrial Revolution there has been a gradual shifting of financial power into the hands of a few. The present system, in the opinion of the speaker, has served its place in the spreading of industry, but now it has stopped working.

Governments and industries will never be able to give necessary services to the people and at the same time pay off their enormous debts is Mr. Woodsworth's belief. For the reason of over-capitalization no industry can continue to pay both wages and dividends.

The advantages of the past are gone and the older generations have skimmed the cream off and left far fewer opportunities for the youth of today to get started.

Politics and politicians, Mr. Woodsworth placed in a position secondary to the banks and bankers. As soon as the machine of capitalism stopped paying profits to the limited group it was stopped functioning.

Successful Prom Held By Three Junior Years

The Junior Prom, which has come to be an annual event, was enjoyed by a large crowd which attended the delightfully arranged affair at the La Salle Hotel. The ballroom was very attractive with the walls covered with deep bunting and the ceiling with blue streamers with quantities of bright stars peeping from them. Over the orchestra platform the words "Junior Prom, 1933" were arranged in a crest of colored lights. The music was supplied by Warmington's Orchestra. The patronesses for the dance were Mrs. Frederick Etherington, Mrs. A. L. Clark, Mrs. John Matheson and Miss Hilda Laird.

The two suppers in the main dining hall formed a novel feature of the evening and the accompanying singing and tap dancing entertainment proved very popular.

Queen's Tennis Champion Sweeps Sensationally Through Badminton Play Offs And Emerges Victorious

DOUG. GRANT

Champion From West Proves No Match For Grant In Final Game

Montreal, P.Q. — Leaving behind him a trail of overthrown champions, and outstanding performers from all parts of the Dominion, Doug Grant, Queen's sophomore and college tennis champion for the past two years, emerged victorious in another department of sports over the week-end when he turned back Charlie Jones of Winnipeg, the last opponent in his quest for the Canadian badminton championship.

Jones who is the Manitoba champion proved to be no match for Grant who sent his older and more experienced opponent to defeat by the score of 15-4, 15-1. Grant, who has held the Kingston city badminton championship for some years proved to be master of the large group of stars who assembled in Montreal for the annual Canadian tournament. Throughout his ascent to the Dominion he disposed of his opponents in a regular and decisive fashion. His sensational victory in the finals climaxed a week of consistently brilliant play, which was the outstanding feature of the tourney.

Considered a "dark horse" from the beginning he set out to furnish the biggest surprise of the tournament by walking away with the men's singles championships, by beating the highly rated Charlie Jones, of Winnipeg, in straight games. A great battle

First Ontario Radio Therapy Institute Opened Here—Has Latest Equipment

Hundreds Of People Saw Local Cancer Clinic Shortly After It was Officially Opened Friday

The Ontario Radio - Therapy (Cancer) Institute, located in the Kingston General Hospital, was officially opened on Friday. It was the first of three institutes to be opened in this province; the Toronto Institute will be opened shortly and the London institute some time this year.

Hundreds of people visited the institute, which consists of four rooms. One room is for deep therapy ray treatments, another for radium treatments and two rooms in which patients will rest while receiving radium treatments.

Hon. Dr. J. M. Robb, Minister of Health for Ontario, and J. W. S. McCullough, Ontario's chief inspector of health, were the government's representatives at the opening. The Minister brought 100 milligrammes of radium to the institute to be used in the treatment of cancer. The agreement between the hospital and the government was also signed yesterday.

On Friday evening in the K.C.V.I. auditorium the Minister of Health and Dr. McCullough together with Mayor Dr. Bruce Hopkins, Hon. T. Ashmore Kidd and Dr. Frederick Etherington addressed a public meeting and the two representatives from the Provincial Department of Health gave most instructive educational addresses on cancerous diseases.

Hon. Dr. Robb

In his opening remarks Hon. Dr. Robb spoke of the trying times through which the world is now passing and of the different solutions such as inflation and revolution that have been offered for our economic problem. "A revolution is inconceivable," stressed the speaker. "We are a long suffering race and we will not see our institutions destroyed," he added.

Continuing, the Minister of Health defended the present economic system. "Under the present system the poorest boy in the country with ability and intelligence can attain the highest position in the country's gift" he emphasized. "Is it a bad system? I'll let you answer that."

The Minister reviewed the history of the early civilizations of the world, and said that the downfall of the early Egyptian and Grecian civilization, which had reached high standing, were brought about through inability to adequately combat disease. "The health of a nation is it's greatest asset," he said.

As Minister of Health Dr. Robb said that he and his department had a two-fold purpose, the prevention and the curing of disease. "It has

Position As Dietitian Not Hard To Obtain

Mrs. Campbell Spoke At Fireside Meeting

"In these days a girl with a household science degree is almost sure of a position, even if she does not marry," stated Mrs. W. A. Campbell, guest speaker at the recent Fireside Talk. Mrs. Campbell was formerly dietitian at Rockwood Hospital.

To obtain a degree, two years at a university, followed by two years at either the Quebec or Ontario Macdonald College, are necessary. The course includes cooking, sewing, interior decorating, economics, English, and public speaking. A thorough knowledge of chemistry is very important. A six-months' post graduate course under a capable dietitian in a well-known institution, while not absolutely essential is very desirable.

The various branches of dietetics are teaching, hospitals, tea rooms or hotels, social service work, and consulting dietitian.

Mrs. Campbell told of her work as a dietitian in several hospitals. A hospital dietitian must plan the menus, be responsible for the trays, and instruct the nurses in dietetics. She must know how to order the food so that as little as possible is wasted, and must know how to deal with servants. The work in a hospital is more interesting than teaching dietetics, Mrs. Campbell stated with her own experience in mind, and has an advantage over consulting and tea-room work in that no capital is necessary. The average salary is $125 a month, which generally includes room and laundry, except in government positions where these are extra charges.

Mrs. Campbell stated that one of her most interesting positions was that of social service dietitian in a large clinic in Detroit. Her work consisted of planning diets, investigating cases and instructing the patients in cooking their food.

Alumnae of Kingston Entertain Levana '33

Members of Levana '33 were the guests of honour at a very delightful tea on Saturday in Ban Righ Hall when the Kingston Branch of the Queen's Alumnae Association entertained. The guests were received by Miss Laird. Mrs. George Young, the President of the Alumnae Association, and Miss Mary Rowland, the President of the Kingston Alumnae Association.

The Common Room of Ban Righ Hall was charming with houquets of spring flowers and the tea table was centred with daffodils and pink snapdragons. Tea was poured by the Past Presidents of the local Association, among whom were Mrs. Hitsman, Miss May Macdonnell, Miss Gordon, Miss Florence O'Donnell, Miss May Chown and Mrs. Douglas Chown. They were assisted in serving by a group of recent graduates.

We Must Use The Means At Hand To Effect Reforms We Desire. Says J. S. Woodsworth

"We must use the means to our hand to effect the reforms we are aiming at," Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, leader of the C.C.F. party, told a Journal representative in an interview on Saturday.

He went on to explain that while he hoped the C.C.F. at the next Dominion elections would secure no less than sixty-five seats, in that event his party would be in a minority but would hold a balance of power between the two older political parties. "We would like a majority of course," he said "but we shall use whatever means we can under the existing legislative machinery to carry C.C.F. measures through parliament." In this connection he alluded to the position that prevailed a few years ago when the majority of the Liberals over the Conservatives was so slender that a few independent members of whom he was one, were able to carry through a number of useful pieces of legislation, as a condition of their support for the government.

Questioned as to the specific manner in which a C.C.F. government would proceed if returned to office, Mr. Woodsworth proved evasive. He seemed unready to commit himself to a detailed declaration of policy. When still further pressed he suggested that it was not necessary at this stage to say exactly how the C. C. F. program was to be made effective.

The Badminton Champion

Without a doubt the most pleasant event of the week-end for Queen's was the sensational triumph registered by Doug Grant in the Dominion Badminton Tournament which was held in Montreal. His feat of capturing the Canadian championship in the men's division has been justly acclaimed as one of the outstanding achievements of the year in the fields of sport.

Throughout the tourney Doug displayed a scintillating brand of play and in his long climb to the title he turned back an exceptionally strong field which included provincial champions and outstanding performers from all parts of Canada. Perhaps the most remarkable feature of his successful campaign was the decisive manner in which he disposed of all opposition in his way to the Canadian crown. Considered as a "dark horse" by the press he calmly set out to prove that chance had nothing to do in his success. After Doug's clear-cut victory over Charlie Jones, Manitoba champion, in the finals, the press was unreserved in its acclaim of the youthful champion from Queen's.

Doug has been the college tennis champion here for the past two years, and the University rejoices in his latest triumph. The winning of the Canadian badminton title is, indeed, a great distinction, and every Queen's student is proud of the fact that Doug is a student of this institution.

The Journal takes much pleasure in extending to the new champion most hearty congratulations, and hopes that he may retain the title for many seasons to come. We also wish at this time to congratulate Professor Lindsay Malcolm who was elected president of the Canadian Badminton Association at its last meeting.

Compulsory Attendance

The petition drawn up and presented by Science '33 to their Dean requesting the abolition of compulsory attendance at classes for all final year men opens once again that oft discussed question. One will now be forced to listen to many a long-winded dissertation on this highly controversial question. Consequently, we might as well take our stand on the matter now, and then forget all about it because we feel that the petitioners will have little success with their appeal.

We agree with Science '33 that compulsory attendance for final year should be abolished. The case for the abolishment of the attendance rule has been forcibly and well presented. On reaching his final year a student realizes the value of work, and can cover the prescribed work without being forced to do so. If he should fail to understand the value of work he might as well fail his year, then and there, and leave college at once because a college course can do nothing for him. He might as well leave and take his place with the other misfits and sloth-ridden individuals who are cluttering up the world, and clamouring for a more equal distribution of wealth and opportunity. Again, the better student suffers irreparably as a result of compulsory attendance. He is forced to sit through lectures, or attend labs which do not profit him greatly. His time could be spent more advantageously on general reading, or in extra-curricular activities which would give him a better background for his début into the world of actuality.

One of the pertinent clauses of the petition reads as follows: "If he can be relied upon to do work that should be done without compulsion the graduating student will be more independent and reliable." This is one of the strongest arguments against compulsory attendance. College students generally exhibit little ingenuity. When left upon their own resources they flounder in the most discouraging fashion. May we not attribute this deplorable fact to the "spoon-feeding" practised in our educational systems. The responsibility of success or failure should be placed entirely on the student, because there will come a time when he must stand on his own, make his own decisions and bear the consequences. Why should not the boy or girl be given the opportunity of meeting this responsibility earlier in life when it is not too late to try again if success were not to crown the first attempt?

It is our belief that the compulsory attendance rule will not be lifted. Such an experiment has been tried here and it failed, we learn. It seems that Canadian students (and most students for that matter) are not ready for such an experiment. The trouble lies with the students themselves in a large measure. As long as Universities remain amusements grounds for men and hunting grounds for women the situation will not change, and college students will not forget that they are college students. The future is, indeed, not encouraging.

Student Activity Renaissance

Critics of college students must think twice now before entering upon their usual tirade of the evil straits into which the college generation has fallen. Slowly the country is realizing that their former concept of the college student, an impractical worthless organism enjoying a four-year joy-ride, is unjustified. Certainly during the past five years the character of the college man has undergone a radical change. Financial reverses at home have caused many students to earn their own way through college as best they can, and it may be safely said that the majority are equal to the task. The depression, which is closing an era of materialism started in the World War, is also accomplishing a similar end for the college student.

At practically every college and university the story is the same: the student has become serious-minded. From Wisconsin comes the news that more than 3000 students secure part-time jobs during the past year and that a sizeable group are able to maintain a maximum expense per year of $110. But this seat of learning is not alone in this respect, for everywhere the younger generation is scraping to make both ends meet. As this fact becomes evident, it is easier to make a true evaluation of the worth of students. Another news item reveals that a co-ed at New York University has been able to provide meals for herself at an average cost of $.24 per day in order that she may continue her education. At Princeton, a name synonymous with wealth to many, nearly a third of the under-graduates are registered with the Student Employment bureau. From Maine to California and from Oregon to Florida the situation on every campus is practically identical. Certainly this is proof of a new and reorganized attitude on the part of students that may in time counteract the refrains of college critics which we have been so accustomed to hear.

—Daily Tar Heel.

The Prince and the Professor

The most sensational, and the most reckless, of recent attacks on the relation of the university economist to the depression has home from Mr. Frederick Prince, Boston capitalist, who brands the professor as either a meddler or a coward, and asks, "Why should a man ever run away from the world except through cowardice? Professors are our curse — they talk too much." For his part, he recommends in a very definite fashion that the nation "chuck its professors," and draw its economic enlightenment from more practical sources.

From Mr. Prince's particular point of view, the conclusion that the college teacher represents a fair weather claque may well seem irresistible. He has probably grown a little weary of complacent rationalizations after 1929 from those who were once very prone to accept the new era without a second thought. But this does not change, although it may modify the fact that his own position is untenable.

Endowments notwithstanding, the teacher is in no sense a lackey to impervious magnates. His duty is primarily one of instruction, to those who come to him for the purpose, and there is no evidence to substantiate the claim that the science of economics is not ably and disinterestedly taught in our colleges. No medical lecturer is condemned for the methods of quacks with whom he has had no contact. Nor can the teacher of economics be fairly attacked when those who in greedy confidence seized into their hands the control and the sweets of financial domination, ignored the rules of their own game. His was, and remains, the task of teaching economic laws and theories, alive to their conflicts and mutations in practice; but in himself usually withdrawn from their direct, everyday application on the exchanges and in the factories.

. . . one feels an ironic inconsistency in Mr. Prince's simultaneous dicta that college chairs attract only those whom the world refuses, and that the incumbents of those chairs did not save the world from disaster. The harassed capitalist's desire to pass the buck is, however, not too difficult to understand.

—The Harvard Crimson.

Any further information desired may be obtained from the Registrar.

Alexander von Humboldt Foundation

The German Consul-General at Montreal invites applications for scholarships of the Alexander von Humboldt foundation. The scholarships afford free tuition at a German university or technical college for one year, and a monthly allowance of 110 Reichsmark (about $32 at the current rate of exchange). Applications for the academic session 1933-34 must reach the secretary of the Humboldt foundation not later than March 31st, 1933.

Candidates should possess the following qualifications:

(1) They must have completed their academic studies in their own country and must have an outstanding academic record. Testimonials from the applicant's professors will be required.

(2) They must either have already entered upon a career or else have a definite prospect of securing upon their return from Germany a position which will enable them to assist to an unusual extent in strengthening the intellectual and cultural relations between Germany and their own country.

(3) Their knowledge of the German language must be sufficiently good to enable them to profit by the lectures at a German university and to do research work.

Further information may be obtained from Professor Henel of the German Department or from the German Consul-General direct.

Orals in French

Oral examinations for all students taking French classes numbered 10 or over will be held during the last week of term. The exact date and time will be announced later.

Socialism's Solution For Present Economic Problems

Socialism means thinking of what is best for society as a whole, said the speaker, and there was no cause to fear the word. In the case of Canada there was no hard and fast rule or any set doctrine, but merely the working out of what was best for the people.

A plan of carefully related co-operation between industries in needed. Individualism was all right in the pioneer days, but now co-operation is needed. The speaker suggested the motto "Paddle your own canoe" be replaced with "We're all in the same boat."

A central bank, a central planned economy, and a thinking people are the necessities of the day, declared the speaker. He then pointed out that universities and churches were realizing that the present system was incompatible with Christian ideals. A new party with new policies is needed.

In closing the speaker pointed out that there has not been enough thought devoted to public business and that the revival of interest in public affairs by the younger generation was a hopeful sign.

Nice Long Vacation

Students at Bennington College for Women are allowed a two months' winter recess so that they can have time for research work.

Radio-Therapy Institute Has Latest Equipment

been said that the Government spends too much money curing and not enough for disease prevention," said Dr. Robb.

Speaking of the great burden the hospitals of the province are now bearing, Dr. Robb said that last year the revenue from paying patients in Ontario hospitals was $1,000,000 less than the previous year. He pointed out that with the increase of indigent patients the province and municipalities would have to bear this cost.

The Minister of Health outlined a few of the phases of the work of the Department of Health. He referred to maternal welfare and told his audience that last year in Ontario 440 mothers died from child birth. He pointed out that the department endeavored to find out the cause of many of these deaths and in one locality, where six deaths had occurred, investigation showed that a nurse who had an infected throat was the cause of these deaths.

Protecting the children of the country against disease was another work of the department. Dr. Robb said that the department also was interested to a great extent in the purity of the milk and water of the province.

Radio Therapy

In speaking of the radio-therapy institute, Dr. Robb said that it was a great asset to Kingston. He congratulated the city on its two efficient hospitals, the Kingston General and the Hotel Dieu Hospital, and said that the medical men of Kingston were without peers in Canada.

The Minister of Health reviewed the various stages taken by the Government before these cancer institutes had been authorized. In 1930 Hon. Howard Ferguson, who was then Premier of Ontario, had advocated that a commission be appointed to investigate the best way of combating this rapidly increasing disease. In 1931 the Government under the premiership of Hon. George Henry had named a commission that had visited various parts of the United States and Europe and had reported on their findings of the most effective ways to check this disease.

During the remarks, Dr. Robb said that in Stockholm, Sweden, the best cancer institute in the world was found. Dr. W. T. Connell of Kingston, was a member of this commission and Dr. Robb thanked the local physician for his wonderful help on this commission.

In closing, Dr. Robb said that all cases of cancer would not be cured by this new equipment at the hospital. He added that there were three effective ways of curing the disease, if caught in its early stages; surgery, radium treatments and radio therapy treatments. He predicted a great decline in cancer mortality as a result of opening the institutes and in closing said that he hoped the Government would not be accused of spending the money unwisely in the erection of these institutes.

During his address, Dr. Robb told his audience that he had brought 100 milligrammes of radium to the Kingston General Hospital to be used in the treatment of cancer.

Dr. McCullough

Dr. J. W. S. McCullough, chief inspector of health for the province, in his remarks, stressed the appalling increase in deaths from cancer throughout the world. In 1914 in Ontario there was 69 deaths from cancer in every 100,000 people in the province; last year this had increased to 110. Dr. McCullough pointed out that this increase was not confined to Ontario but was found all over the world. In Great Britain, in a little more than 50 years, the death rate from cancer had increased more than five times. Dr. McCullough said that this increase might not be as bad as it would at first appear, because the medical profession was becoming more proficient in diagnosing cases and was finding more cancerous cases. The speaker also pointed out as a hopeful sign that the lives of men had been increased; the average man was today living years longer than the man in 1900 and the woman of today 16 years longer than the woman of 33 years ago.

The speaker in explaining to his audience what cancer is, said that cancer cells are unrestrained in their division and unlike other cells of the body, many of which do not divide in later years, multiply rapidly.

Dr. McCullough said that the common symptons of cancer were irregular bleedings, sores that fail to heal and chronic indigestion. Hoarseness was sometimes a symptom of cancer of the larynx. A lump on the body or on the breast of a woman was also a frequent sign of cancerous growths. The speaker said that upon any of these signs, the family physician should be consulted immediately.

The speaker said that the cause of cancer was not known, but added that there were certain things that influenced the disease. Of these chronic irritation or prolonged irritation was one.

In speaking of the cure of cancer, Dr. McCullough mentioned surgery, radiation from radium and deep therapy rays. He said that radium rays will kill cancer cells on the tissue.

Dr. Etherington

Dr. Frederick Etherington, Dean of the Faculty of Medicine at Queen's University, was the chairman of the evening. In his remarks he drew attention to the fact that Kingston's water supply was not what it should be and said that some of the money spent on unemployment relief in the city might be used to rectify and improve this system. He also spoke on the milk delivered in the city in which typhoid germs were recently discovered. Dr. Etherington introduced the speakers of the evening, Hon. Dr. J. M. Robb, Ontario's Minister of Health, Dr. J. W. S. McCullough, Mayor Dr. Bruce Hopkins and Hon. T. Ashmore Kidd, M.L.A.

Federation Of Students Sponsors Radio Debates

Four debating tours and one national radio debate will be sponsored next session by the National Federation of Canadian University Students if present plans of its officers work out. Two tours will take place within Canada and two outside.

On the invitation of the National Union of Students of England and Wales, an N.F.C.U.S. team will tour Great Britain this fall. Canada's team will be composed of one Maritime and one Western Canadian student. This will be the second N.F.C.U.S. debating team to visit England—the first, in 1928, was chosen from Toronto and McGill. The other tour outside of Canada will also take place in the fall of 1933, if suitable arrangements can be made. It will be a tour of northwestern United States by a Western Canadian team.

Something in the nature of an experiment will be tried in the fall within Canada. The officers of the N.F.C.U.S., are hoping to arrange a tour of Ontario and the three prairie provinces by a French-speaking team from the University of Montreal. The fourth debating tour of the session will take place in the spring of 1934, when either an Australian team or one from Bates College, Maine, will tour Canada from coast to coast.

Another experiment is likely to be tried sometime during the session—a national radio debate under the anspices of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission. If it is held, the four debators will be chosen from the Maritimes, Central Canada, the Prairie Universities and British Columbia respectively.

"I don't like your heart action," said the doctor, applying his stethoscope. "You've had some trouble with angina pectoria, haven't you?"

"You're partly right, Doc.," answered George sheepishly. "Only that 'ain't her name. It's Tillie."

Friend—How did you like that summer resort?

Spend—Well, I went there for change and rest, but the landlord got the change and the waiters got the rest.

S. C. M. Shrapnel

"Pacifism, Socialism, Communism, Nationalism, Protestantism, Catholicism—all these succeed in winning important sections of youth for their cause, but none of them can claim to have gained the support of the youth as such. But if this youth has no positive common purpose, it has nevertheless a common enemy. His name is "bourgeois". The grave of the bourgeois is the meeting place of the younger generation.

. . . It is not so long ago that young 'socialists, national-socialists, facists, communists and Christians met together at an International Congress in Frankfort and found their one basis of agreement in their common determination to fight bourgeois society and bourgeois philosophy.

It is, however, a well known fact that an alliance of war-time seldom endures when the war is over. When peace has been established, the Allies are prone to fight over the spoils. The decisive question is not: "What do we fight again?" but rather "What do we fight for?"

Those communists, socialists or fascists who preach the gospel of collectivity and solidarity, but who continue to believe in the doctrine of society as an aim in itself are no better than the individualist bourgeois with his liberalism. The end of the bourgeois is then only a new beginning if we sacrifice our longing for securities of all kinds and subject our life and society to a God Who breaks through our finiteness and makes us lead lives which point beyond themselves."

The above quotations are from the fourth quarter 1932 issue of "The Student World" published at Geneva. Some of its statements are significant coming from a man who is in contact with the picked representatives of student leadership in Europe and America. This issue of the Magazine is devoted to articles on "the end of the Bourgeois." It is interesting to find University students who are still unaware that world wide changes are under way. Towards the revolution, to call it such, there are, with their variants three possible attitudes on the part of the student, active opposition, active support, or most pitiful of all, indifference and ignorance of the world forces at work.

Student Asked To Return Stolen Lion Till Saturday

The Publicity Manager of the Queen's Dramatic Guild asks that whoever removed the colored poster advertising "Androcles and the Lion" from the Library return it immediately. The Manager has no objection if this over anxious collector takes the sign back again after Saturday night. Until then it is an important part of the Guild's advertising scheme.

Faculty Athletes

The faculty of Wesleyan University recently issued a challenge to the Seniors to engage in an athletic contest. Desiring to "show their worth as athletes," the faculty members offered to meet the students in such contests as basketball, squash, handball, volley-ball and bridge.

Levana Court

At a meeting of Levana '35 held at noon yesterday, it was decided that there will be no Soph Court this year. The small number of complaints against the Freshettes was the cause of the abolishment of the Court.

Sunday Worship

A sophomore critic at Rutgers complains of the frivolous upper-class attitude during chapel services on Sundays. The following articles were said to be in evidence: Five funny papers, two nearly complete sports sections, one crossword puzzle, one copy of the "Trial and Death of Socrates" and one other text book.

THE CAMPUSCOPE

Corns

Serious trouble and great good fortune come occasionally upon men and women, but the greatest part of the life of the greatest number of people is composed of an endless series of little joys and minor irritations, a succession of incidents varying in nature from the dully inane to the casually idiotic. Debilating, paralysing, and even fatal accidents and diseases, when they strike, usually arouse previously unsuspected forces, their blows often tap latent sources of strength, the real pain and distress which accompany them may be the stimulation necessary for the late realization of the possibilities of an indolent mind. Unless one is prepared by a knowledge of this principle, the essentially cheerful atmosphere of an institution of the blind or the hopelessly crippled must always come as a surprise. But the constant wearing of everyday troubles seldom calls out a sufficiency of man's reserve power and its effects never enlist the sympathy of his peers.

For instance the unfortunate upon whom a shoemaker or fashion expert has imposed a pedal hyperkeratosis meets little sympathy more genuine than the gushing hypocrisy that is one of the expressions of woman's barbarous inhumanity to woman. And yet the accumulated misery arising from a pressure point on one toe can ruin a digestion, a normally placid expression, and the peace of a family circle. Hell hath no fury like a woman's corns. Like other unpleasant sequelae of intermittent pressure, the corn tends to become larger and harder until relief may only be obtained by removing all covering from the affected member and soothing the outraged nerve endings by plunging it into some bland medium, usually getting it into hot water.

Even as a raison d'etre of otherwise outworn razor blades the existence of a corn is unjustifiable. The condition, where-ever found may always be traced to the same causative factor, intermittent pressure concentrated upon a small area of epithelium, usually over a prominence like the dorsal surface of a toe. Army surgeons report the finding of corns bebind the ears as a result of the modern tin hat, and it is possible to acquire callosities where one least expects them, following the continued use of modernistic furniture, but the foot suffers most often. The protective and decorative coverings with which mankind disfigures the most graceful of animal bodies are designed in accordance with weird tribal customs and footwear is the least logically designed of all apparel. That a sensitive and complicated part of the human body, subjected to constant friction in a stiff unyielding box, should develop abnormal thickenings is to be naturally expected. If one put horseshoes on a cow, one would expect to produce corned beef.

No one, strangely enough, has ever undertaken the removal of corns by manipulation. The time-honoured cult of the carver has still many adherents, but the softening and peeling of the piled-up epithelium when plastered is the system most used now, fortunately. Troublesome infections are quite likely to follow indiscriminate paring, and complete removal is impossible by amateur surgical methods. Removal by any means gives only temporary relief unless the cause of the trouble is removed. For men at least, properly made shoes are procurable, and little vain self-satisfaction need be sacrificed by the choice of a comfortable shape. We shodd be especially considerate of a member which supports the whole body weight.

Meds '34 To Hold St. Patrick's Dance

St. Patrick's Day, the LaSalle ballroom, and a year dance staged hy Medicine '34. Now there's a combination for you—one that settles all arguments as to where you will make whoopee on the 17th of March.

St. Patrick was a jolly old fellow himself and he left behind him a race of Irishmen that know how to have a good time. We cannot all be Irishmen, but we can all cash in on the spirit of the old Saint when he stages his big party on the 17th. With a long list of famous year parties behind them, Meds. '34 feel that they are quite capable of planning a social event that will please everyone.

In addition to the whoopee spirit of the evening, there are other features that will cause toes to itch as the date draws near. Warmington's big orchestra will provide soft flowing music, from nine o'clock until 2 a.m. Wade Orser, the Gananoque singer will prove an additional attraction, favors for the ladies will be unique and valuable, and there will be novelties galore, something you don't get at year dances.

No foolin' the ballroom of the LaSalle will be a mighty peppy place on that big evening, and it would be a shame to miss it, as it will be the last outing before the doggone exams. get a strangle hold.

Tickets ran out very early last year, as only ninety were to be sold and the entire university wanted to go at the last minute, and no luck. The pasteboards cost only $1.50 for all the attractions and can be secured from the committee, Jack Baker, Leo Limoges, Bob Ralph and Geo. Elliott, or get in touch with any member of the year.

Humor is getting highbrow. All you do is scrawl off a dizzy picture and then have the little kid or old lady cuss.—Baker Orange.

Letter Reveals Difficulties Facing Employment Bureau

Editor's Note. The difficulties of the employment situation with reference particularly to college students and graduates is not merely a matter of concern to those college men who are unable to find jobs to-day. The letter printed below was received by Mr. Gordon Smith of the Queen's Employment Service from the general Manager of one of the largest business firms in Canada and bears witness to the sympathetic attitude of the business world towards the college graduate who now finds himself "up against it."

"Dear Mr. Smith:

It is certainly distressing to know that we cannot be of any assistance to you at this time in securing positions for college graduates.

Of all the conditions that have developed out of this, so-called, "Depression", I really think that the unemployment of college trained men is possibly the most serious. There are no doubt thousands of these fellows out of work to-day and more graduating from the Universities to-morrow that will not find it possible to secure jobs.

It is difficult to forecast the kind of thinking that will pass through the minds of these unemployed college graduates. They must not lose confidence in their country or their people and it is necessary that they keep up their courage, which is no small job in itself.

Again, I say, we certainly are sorry that we can be of no assistance to you at this time.

Sincerely, etc.,
General Manager."

Student Organization Plans Interesting Programme

Canadian students who intend to visit Europe this summer will be interested in two events which are being arranged by the Confédération Internationale des Etudiants (the C.I.E.)

The annual congress of the C.I.E. will be held during August at Venice with the Italian Student Federation as host. The National Federation of Canadian University Students is not at present a member of the C.I.E., but nevertheless, it has been invited to send observers to the Venice Congress. Any Canadian students who expect to be in Italy in August and who would like to attend the congress should communicate with Max Wershof, Assistant Secretary N.F.C.U.S., c/o University of Alberta, Edmonton.

The International University Sports, which are organized every two years by the C.I.E. will be held this summer at Turin the first week in September. Canadian students who will be in Italy and who would like to attend the sports either as spectators or participants should write to Max Wershof or to the Dominion Students Athletic Union, 163 Strand, London W.C. 2, England. This organization is endeavouring to arrange, on behalf of the N.F.C.U.S., for the entry of a Canadian team at the Turin games.

Letter To The Editor

Dear Editor:

In regard to the notice in your last issue announcing that applications will now be received for rooms in the Women's Residence, I should like to know whether such applications may be made by anyone, irrespective of age, sex or nationality.

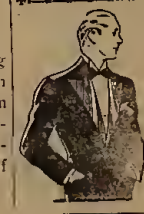
I have been informed that this is so and a careful reading of the above-mentioned notice does not disavow this belief. If such is the case, I am very glad to offer my greetings and felicitations for this wholly commendable step in the direction of co-education. The Proto-Surrealist party may now become a reality.

Now, Mr. Editor, if I am right in this belief, I hope you will file this letter as prima facie evidence of my being the first to make application for two double rooms in different parts of the residence: this is necessary as there will be undoubtedly a unprecedentedly heavy demand for rooms when the facts become known.

Yours in all sincerity,
MEDS. '34.

Phil. Prof. Says Religion Is Luxury, Not Necessity

Cincinnati, O.—A professor of philosophy who recently appeared here for a debate, reveals some astounding opinions on religion.



He is Dr. T. V. Smith, of the University of Chicago, who believes that religion is not necessary; that it is permissable, but a luxury.

"Religion is a belief in a power not ourselves," he says. "We all need a certain amount of power, but religion goes us one better and makes God an omnipoent power, and that is seen. It is never needed. It is a waste.

"There would be no need to worry about morality if the church disappeared. There always will be some community organization to take care of that. The Boy Scouts, for instance, are doing a much better job of teaching morality and teaching how to live than is religion.

"I say the word would be better without religion because the thing that would replace religion would be a better thing."

THE KID FROM SPAIN
With Eddie Cantor, Lyda Roberti, Robert Young and others

"The Kid from Spain" is an unqualified success from the point of view of the Cantor following. Cantor has absolute control here; and he dominates every scene. Perhaps never before on the screen was his showmanship so completely brought into play. Cantor is a clown, and an artistic one of sorts, whose clowning is never relaxed. Even when his mouth is shut—and the gag-men have put some good lines into it—Cantor is still almost frenziedly, the comedian, engaging in ludicrous pantomine or jittering all over the place. Most of Cantor's popularity depends on just this flair for showmanship, this easy way of taking the audiences into his confidence, of never once permitting the contact between actor and spectator to become disconnected.

"The Kid from Spain" is so much Cantor's show that while it is in progress one is amused and delighted and not for a minute critical. It is only in retrospect that the music and lyrics are neither catching nor inspired, the dancing dull stuff, the subsidiary love scene an act of supererogation. And Lyda Roberti, individual and disturbing Polack, one of the most "hi-de-hi" dancers on Broadway, a smooth and refreshing babe in fact, was not once given the chance to go into the dances she has made famous. B plus.

AT THE TIVOLI
THE DEVIL COMMANDS
with
Mae Clarke, Mil Hamilton, and Alan Dinehart

"The best laid plans of mice and men"—as Robert Burns once said, sums up the plot of "The Devil Commands" at the Tivoli.

Alan Dinehart in the rôle of the lawyer, friend and adviser to an invalid millionaire, plans a thorough and methodical way to get rid of those who are in his way. Dinehart is in love with the millionaire's nurse, Mae Clarke, who in turn is in love with the rich old invalid's protegé (Neil Hamilton). In order to obtain the nurse for himself it is necessary to do away with the millionaire and his ward. Dinehart attempts to do this in a very subtle and mercenary manner without the hoped for success.

The photographic atmosphere supplies most of the grimness and mystery to this picture, with a spacious old home equipped with moveable paneled walls, creepy cellars and what have you. Alan Dinehart plays the half-crazed lawyer fairly well. His acting is the only thing that makes one realize that after all this is a mystery play.

As with all mysteries the story drags along collecting more complications with every scene and finally ending with the tuite happy conclusion. There is a bit of comic relief when an old drunkard, engaged to play the role of Santa Claus, manages to get into the wine cellar.

The rest of the bill at the Tivoli comprises a very good news reel and a Stupid Harry Langdon comedy with a glimpse of Garbo and Gilbert in a baby carriage scene. There is also a look-in on a charity show in Hollywood with all your favorites on parade which is fairly entertaining. C.

Must Use Means At Hand To Get Desired Reforms

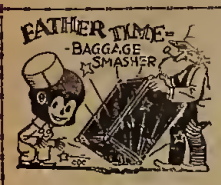
Questioned as to the method by which a policy of nationalization of natural resources was to be carried out Mr. Woodsworth finally admitted that the government might finance the payment of expropriated owners by the flotation of a bond issue. But, he added, they should not receive the full price of their property, for in this case national ownership would start out as it did in the case of the C.N.R. under a very heavy handicap.

Mr. Woodsworth, on the subject of the present organization of the C.C.F., explained that it was difficult to organize without any funds, although the formation of the new party had met with a most encouraging reception. At present local initiative must play a dominant part in the expansion of the Party, he stated.



In a final word Mr. Woodsworth, with a gleam in his eye, spoke of the difficulty and anxiety which the formation of the new group was occasioning the Liberals; he expressed the belief that it was likely that the Liberal party would find itself before long practically squeezed out of existence between the Conservative Party and the C.C.F.

"A spoonful of water contains 270,000 potential H.P.," says a scientist. H——man, that can't be water!

"Oh, no, dear, I'm sure he's a kind man," said the co-ed. "I just heard him say he put his shirt on a horse which was scratched."

By R.M.

THEY WERE DEFEATED
By Rose Macaulay

There is perhaps no field of history more fascinating to the historian of many interests than the study of a Civil-War-England. Rose Macaulay has chosen the year 1640 for her novel, and it offers her material in the form of politics, religious controversy, metaphysics, poetry and a thousand other pieces to fit into the jig-saw puzzle of English life, as it was 25 years after the death of Shakespeare. The author must have steeped herself year-long in the atmosphere which she gives to her book, and since many of the characters are real personages she had to find her way into their personalities through the literature of the day.

Parson Herrick in his bucolic Devonshire parish is one of the central figures of the first part of the book: and the rural charm of a 17th century village, together with its primitive brutality and its superstitions are dessribed with a sympathy which explains the varied moods of Herrick's poetry. Then the scene changes to Cambridge, where a veritable galaxy of poets and philosophers had settled, and Milton, Cowley, Crashaw and a host of lesser satellites wander through the pages, forming a serious background to the very charming romance that has been built up round two obscure poets who gave Miss Macaulay nothing but their names and a few elusive poems as clues to their characters.

The hopeless tangle of ecclesiastical doctrines, the disputes of Arminians, Brownists and Laudians which characterized the beginning of the Puritan-Royalist conflict, all these are skilfully touched upon; indeed the question of religion occupied so prominent a position at Cambridge that it necessarily plays a significant part in the book.

One of the triumphs of this novel is the language in which the characters speak. From the literature of the day and also (rather obviously sometimes) from Shakespeare, the author has sifted out a remarkably convincing vocabulary which sustains the 17th century atmosphere without irritating the reader by self-conscious archaism.

One hesitates to borrow from another review the phrase "an invaluable piece of historical, literary and sociological research," because such a description seems to condemn the book as a novel, but if it is possible to combine such adjectives with the more popular labels of "readable, charming and romantic," then Rose Macaulay has achieved a book which deserves all these titles, and which gives an amazingly comprehensive sketch of an eventful, historic year of social life.

The Observer

THE POLICY OF THE C.C.F.

The recent visit of Mr. J. S. Woodsworth to Queen's gave many people at the University their first introduction to the aims and policies of the C.C.F. It is permissible to wonder whether they are much clearer now than they were previously as to what the new party stands for. Mr. Woodsworth missed a great opportunity by his vagueness and unwillingness to discuss the specific courses of action which the C.C.F. would follow, were it returned to office.

The C.C.F. at present seems to be a party without a programme which it could place before an electorate as a definite statement of its policies.

In his speech, in a private interview afterwards, and again on Sunday morning in a discussion circle, Mr. Woodsworth consistently evaded the main issue, namely what exactly the C.C.F. expects to do when returned to office and how it intends to do it. On this subject, which should have occupied the major part of his speech, the C.C.F. leader had next to nothing to say, and when finally cornered, suggested that it was not necessary for him to speak of that at this time. Elsewhere he remarked that such details are not important.

It is impossible to follow Mr. Woodsworth's reasoning here. Socialism in Canada has everything to gain by a fairly complete statement of policy, and the C.C.F. has certainly nothing to lose by explaining to an unusually sympathetic electorate how the policies it seeks to undertake, may be translated into realities. But without this explanation discussion can get nowhere, unless, of course the C.C.F. expects that its general appeal to hopeful credulity on the part of a bewildered electorate will be strong enough to enable it to gain a considerable representation in the house in spite of itself. Undoubtedly radicalism is "in the air" today, and the C.C.F. may expect to derive a body of support as a back-wash from continued depression. But this misses the point. The C.C.F. is confronted with an unusually favourable opportunity to advance the cause of Socialism in Canada, and yet it seems to be unready to rise to the occasion.

The speakers will be—for the affirmative, Messrs. Thoman and Goodrich, and for the negative, Messrs. Beach and Reid.

MUSIC

Last Thursday the Music Club met at John Stevenson's residence. The program opened with a symphonic poem, Stenka Razin, by the Russian composer Glazounow. Stenka Razin was the Russian Robin Hood, and the composition (which is based on a folk-song) deals with his activities. Next came the main feature, Scheherazade, Rimsky-Korsakov's famous interpretation of the Arabian Nights. "The Sultan Schahriar, convinced of the duplicity and infidelity of all women, vows to slay each of his wives after the first night. The Sultana Scheherazade, however, saved her life by the expedient of recounting to the Sultan a succession of tales over a period of a thousand and one nights. Overcome by curiosity, the monarch postponed from day to day the execution of his wife, and ended by renouncing altogether his sanguinary resolution. Many were the marvels recounted to Schahriar by Scheherazade. For the telling of these she drew from the verses of the poets and the words of folk-songs and tales, connecting her stories one with the other."—It is a masterpiece of orchestration; John Stevenson indicated the principal themes on his flute. First was heard the rough voice of the Sultan ordering his wife to the execution. Then came Scheherazade's "once upon a time" and we found ourselves in Sinbad's ship, sailing now through oily calms and again through terrific hurricanes. Then followed in succession the stories of the Kalander Prince, The Young Prince and The Young Princess, The Festival at Baghdad, and finally the wreck of the ship on a rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior.

The last item on the program was a series of the dances played for Prince Igor's benefit, while he was held captive; for according to Borodine's opera, his enemies the Tartars treated him more as an honoured guest than as a foe, and subsequently the nations became friendly again.

Next week John Stevenson will again entertain the Music Club at 277 Earl St.

McGILL ANNEXES BASKETBALL TITLE

McGill Cagers Beat Mustangs In London

Although McGill clinched the Senior Intercollegiate Basketball title last week-end, they did not let up in their brand of high class playing, and added to their string of victories at London winning 38 to 23 over the purple clad Mustangs.

This was the first game of the final set of scheduled games in the series, and found McGill playing in London on Friday evening and in Toronto on Saturday. As was explained McGill had already assured themselves of a third Intercollegiate triumph by finishing ahead of Varsity and Queen's. Their victory over Western was therefore not required, but the Red team were desirous of extending their string of wins so that a clean sweep of the Intercollegiate series would result.

McGill found a desperate band of Mustangs ready for them, a team with not a thing to lose in the encounter but a lot of glory to gain if they could topple the champs. As in most of their games this season McGill started very slowly, and were tied with Western at half time, the score being 13 all. Hayter, Zavitz and Munro were the big lights for Western and it was their peppy playing that speedily put the Mustangs into a comfortable lead. Their best efforts, however, could not keep the rangy McGill forwards tied up and Young and Rice dropped in a few baskets to tie the count just as the half whistle blew.

The second half was a parade for McGill with Lewin and Hammond doing the honours. Between them they looped in seven baskets, which combined with excellent defensive work had the Westerner's up a tree. McGill showed that they could turn on the steam at any moment and were no doubt saving themselves for the game in Toronto the following night.

Western was poor on foul shooting with only 3 out of a possible 13. The Red men were some better sinking 6 out of 12 awarded them.

Natural History Club

The Natural History Club will meet on Thursday at 4 p.m. in the Old Arts Building. Dr. G. B. Reed will be the speaker. The lecture should prove interesting to students of bacteriology and will give others some knowledge of one of the newer fields of knowledge.

Lively Chapel

Organ music of a classical and semi-classical nature is going to replace chapel services at the University of Southern California. It was also announced that jazz will be played if there is sufficient demand for it.

D. Grant Champion Of Canada At 20

Champion badminton player of all Canada at the age of twenty years, is the proud record of Douglas Grant, son of Col. and Mrs. C. R. Grant of this city, who took the premier honors of the Dominion in Montreal on Saturday.

As a boy, Doug Grant watched his father winning championships with almost monotonous regularity in Halifax; Col. Grant was for years regarded as the peer of badminton players in the Maritimes and several times he won the Halifax and the Nova Scotia championships. As soon as he was able to swing a racquet, Doug showed a remarkable liking for the game and never lost an opportunity to get into scrub games (junior series were not being played at Halifax then).

Coming to Kingston with his parents six years ago, Doug immediately went in for badminton in a big way and even at the age of fourteen years gave every indication of being a coming star. His playing progressed until he won the St. Lawrence District and the Kingston singles' championship last year and repeated with another smashing victory this year. In the Ontario championships in Toronto, he lost out by close margins, but during the past week he came back in sensational style to win the championship of Canada.

Not only is Doug Grant the ace of badminton players but he also is a spectacular tennis player. For three years he won the trophy at the Kingston Tennis Club, and for the past two years has been victorious at Queen's University.

All the members of the Grant family are clever badminton players; Col. C. R. Grant is still as effective a player as he ever was, while Mrs. Grant and Miss K. Grant are players above the average.

Today the flag was flying at the Badminton Club of Kingston for the first time, as a tribute to the splendid achievement of the new Dominion champion.

TRACK CLUB

On Wednesday, March 8th, at 4 p.m. in the Board Room in the Gym, a meeting of the Track and Field Club will be held. There is important business to transact and every member must be out.

Chuck Woolgar, Pres.

New Badminton President

Professor W. Lindsay Malcolm of Queen's, president of the Ontario Badminton Association, was elected president of the Canadian Badminton Association, succeeding Colonel S. H. McKee of Montreal.

Angus McNeill, Winnipeg, was elected vice-president and Keith Mercer, Montreal, honorary secretary.

Sports Views

McGill chalked up their 19th consecutive win in Senior Intercollegiate Basketball competition, with the completion of their scheduled visit to Varsity on Saturday. They have clearly demonstrated this season that they practically outclassed the opposition, winning as they pleased. They have as nicely a balanced team as has been seen in the Intercollegiate for some years and the result of playing so many games with the same team was revealed in their splendid combination.

All the Senior basketball teams will lose stars by graduation this Spring. McGill being the hardest hit, as their great team after four years of play will be broken up. Queen's will lose Harry McLaughlin and Howie Carter; Western will be forced to get along without Hayter and Gunn, while Varsity will not lose more than one or two.

This should make next year's race a more open affair, for with the McGill threat considerably reduced the other three universities will have a better chance to capture the flag.

This year McGill will not be officially considered champions of the Senior Intercollegiate, however, until they knock off the champions of the Senior "B" group. This winner is McMaster University of Hamilton, and they showed similar class in disposing of the other teams in their own group.

McMaster challenged McGill for the title as was their right, and received a favorable reply, although no dates have been arranged. The series will likely be commenced either March 11th, or 14th.

Speculation as to the outcome is not very keen for there are few who would concede Macs a chance to take the Red team. While McMaster may have a mighty nice team, they can hardly equal the class of other teams in the Senior "A" series, and it would take a masterly team to defeat the smooth working McGill outfit. While surprises are always in order, McMaster should not order any championship photographs yet.

Following their usual custom, McGill's championship Hockey team has decided not to continue in the fight for Allan Cup honours. At this season of the year with important exams. drawing nigh, the McGill authorities believe that the possible honours won, might not equal the losses sustained in competition with the profs, and have vetoed the proposition.

Interfaculty hockey is still high in the air at Queen's and all because the Meds. have not as yet completed their interyear games. While this need not hold up the programme, the officials in charge are still dillying around instead of getting the playoffs under weigh. In Medicine Fifth and Fourth year are awaiting word as to their battle which will declare the Interyear championship, although rumours are rife that Final year had their Hockey Championship picture taken immediately on their return to college last October. They look like a real team too, although they couldn't score any goals against Fifth year.

Ample evidence of the high-class hockey that Queen's Juniors ran into in their series with Newmarket, is revealed by the fact that the same Newmarket team made the Toronto Nationals like it in two straight games, Newmarket taking the round 3 to 2. Toronto will howl that they were fortunate as they usually do, but nevertheless the boys from the Very Far North Yonge Street will meet Stratford in the finals and many like their chances. Queen's can hardly feel disgraced by being beaten by such a team.

Varsity Seniors Best McGill Team 32-31

Varsity seniors garnered a little glory for themselves on Saturday evening by defeating the McGill Senior Basketeers by one lonely point the final score being 32 to 31. Incidently the Blue team avenged the overwhelming wallop the Red team handed them to open the basketball season.

The Toronto win was somewhat in the nature of a surprise because of the way McGill waded through other contests and also because Western, not a particularly strong team this year, had a win over Varsity to boast about. It must be remembered that the McGill players had taken part in a strenuous game at London the night before and were therefore not as fresh as they might have been.

The first half was not particularly brilliant for both teams seemed content to play cautiously, and await opportunities that came only occasionally. The half-time score was 17 all, illustrating the close nature of the struggle throughout.

The aggregations came out of their slump in the second half with Toronto piling up what appeared to be an imposing lead of seven points with the end of the contest not far away.

McGill, however, was not to be denied and they staged one of their rallies that has featured every one of their games to date. Lewis who had starred at London again used the Toronto backboard to advantage and the McGill score mounted, Lewin getting 15 points during the game and 10 of them in the second half. Don Young and Smaill also played effectively. For Toronto Varsity, Gold and Wood proved to be best with all members aiding the winners.

This game ended the regular scheduled intercollegiate series and had no bearing on the championship as McGill already had that parked away out of reach.

SPORTS SLANTS

Congratulations are the order of the day for Doug Grant, the Queen's tennis and badminton star. His winning of the Dominion Championship in the men's singles was the big feature of the badminton matches. A cool resourceful player, Doug's win was good news to his friends here.

Medicine plays Arts in the first Interfaculty Hockey game to-day. The time could not be learned but those interested will be able to learn it in time to see two high class stick wielders go to work.

McGill had one dent put in their brightly polished basketball armour on Saturday when Varsity took the last scheduled game. 'Twas only by one point but it's a win.

—Those interested in Track and Field matters should not forget the meeting to-morrow afternoon in the Board Room at the Gym at 4 sharp.

Queen's Tennis Champion Wins Dominion Play Offs

was anticipated but the decisiveness of the triumph of the Kingston youth had a stunning effect on the gallery, which expected great things of Jones. Grant, however, bore down on him and never enabled him to eut loose in customary fashion.

Jack Purcell refereed the game.

Right from the outset, Grant was in the lead and in the first game ran the eount up to five-love before the westerner could register a score. From 5-1, Grant advanced to 8-4 through brilliance in his placements, and a good variation in strokes.

Five times in succession he caught Jones out of position with his out drop shots, while he had fine range on the back corners, and kept hammering away at Jones. From 8-4 Jones never took a single point in that first game, as Grant added a pair, then three, and then another pair to take the first game. In the second game Grant again went into a dominating lead, forging to the front at 5-1.

They alternated service twice at that score, and then Grant went on a rampage which carried him to 14-1 before the western could halt him temporarily.

They alternated serviee at that seore.

Grant won the title when Jones misjudged a high clear to the back line, missing absolutely, and then dropping the match when his attempted drop shot failed to carry over the net.

The youngster from Kingston won with astounding suddenness, and his well constructed and vigorous game, baeked up with sound headwork, fully justified his win.

Jones showed rather unique tactics in his service, performing the serve with his right hand, and doing his stroking with the left.

Domesday Book, Started In 1887, Records History Of University For Fifty Years

Hell! Lo! EVERYBODY!!!—Now don't mistake our salutation. Kate Smith's goes like this: Hell! o-everybudie! Ours is after the style of good old Edna Wallace Hopper; but we faithfully promise not to go on for ever greeting the "reading public" in that disgustingly healthy tone. Our idea of purgatory is a vast multitude of sugary, healthy or croony voices ejaculating hundreds of thousands of Hello Everybodys and Are Yuh Listenin's through hundreds of thousands of microphones. And while we're on the subject of radios, we recommend for interment sueh morons as the Colonel and that chump, Ed. Wynn. The Fire Chief reminds us of the type of creature into whieh a Jig Saw puzzle fiend is bound to develop. Have you ever stopped to consider the very narrow margin which exists between jig-saw puzzles and cutting paper dolls out Rockwood way? Be brief! One leads to the other. That fad is a distinct menaee to a community. And as for Jag-Saws, as far as we ean learn, everyone who attempted a solution has instantaneously become a raving maniae! No wonder: to begin with, there weren't any edges on the pieces; then a person would have to get two Jags, beeause one pieces was directly on the back of another, and there weren't two Jags to be had (a guy was lucky to get one); then, just in case anyone should, in a moment of drunken fenzy, actually get it pieeed together, there was no one to send it to. J. Jag Jagson would be a hard man to locate in all those thousands of demented Chinese..

What are we ranting about anyway? We had every intention of starting an agitation today, and we're going to do it.

How many of our feller-students have ever heard of the Domesday Book of Queen's University? We'll admit that WE hadn't until just a few weeks ago when we found a reference to it in one of our research efforts. We pranced into the Library the other day and in fear and trembling approaehed Mr. Kyte in conneetion with the Domesday Book. He was kind enough to show us into the Treasure Room, where we were refreshed by the sight of a huge red leather-bound tome called the "Queen's University Domesday Book." And this is the story we gleaned.

Along about 1882 the College was pretty hard up. The paltry sum of a quarter of a million dollars was needed to re-endow her. And don't forget, the dollar was worth a lot more then than now. (Guess they were the first to invent a Five Year Plan, because that's what they had in mind for raising the money.) Principal Grant, and the profs, and grads all over the province got organized and started a great drive. By 1887 they had reached their objective and everyone sat back saying to themselves: What the heek, all the names of the subscribers to the fund should be perpetuated along with all the other benefaetors of the College since its foundation. We must find some way of "marking permanently the spirit which from the earliest date has animated them." They also thought it would be a good idea to record the important events in the University since 1841.

Accordingly, at Convocation in 1887 the Chancellor suggested that a Domesday Book be started, after the manner of that initiated by William the Conqueror. The Reverend Dr. Williamson, a member of the faculty since 1841, was commissioned to inscribe in the new book all the outstanding events since the foundation of Queen's and to carry on with the work from year to year.

The Domesday Book contains some 1500 pages, each with a scroll and motto at the top, a small square at the bottom for the date, and a gray border all the rest of the way around. The whole book is beautifully written in longhand, with shaded letters. As for the contents, we must confess that we were slightly disappointed, as the records dealt merely with the financial situation of the College from year to year, long lists of members of the Faculty and Board of Trustees and so on, and lists of all graduates and scholarship winners. When we think of the possibilities!

Near the last page we found an attestation drawn up by the Board of Trustees at the first Convocation of the Twentieth Century, bearing their signatures, which proclaimed that the first volume of the Domesday Book had been completed up to 1900 to their entire satisfaction. (Miss Lois Saunders, then Librarian, had carried out the task which through ill health Dr. Williamson had been forced to abandon).

We then began looking around for the second Book. We took down countless dusty volumes without result. We galloped out and asked Mr. Kyte about it. He told us there was no second volume! Now here it is 33 years since the completion of the first Book and nothing whatever has been done about starting another. We discovered in a 1901 Journal a reference to the Domesday Book and a statement that someone had been thinking about continuing the thing. But none went farther. There have been countless events of interest in these last thirty-three years which, if not recorded now, will be forgotten. Something should be done about it. It is odd that the authorities should abandon a work taken up under such a noble impulse. Apparently the late Chancellor Fleming was mistaken in his hope that the Domesday Book would last. It has lasted all right, but it has been forgotten—neglected for thirty-three years. Oh, yes, you may say that any information desired can be obtained from the back numbers of the Queen's Journal. True: but even the Journal sometimes does not record ALL events of importance. There is a principle and a tradition involved here which should not be ignored.

The Journal recommends that some competent graduate be selected to bring the Domesday Book up to date.

Judge Evan A. Evans, former president of the Wisconsin Alumni association, has proposed that University fraternity and sorority property be transferred to the state to avoid paying taxes.

President William Lowe Bryan of Indiana university edited the school paper, The Indiana Daily Student, during the years 1882-83 and 1883-84.

No Solutions Entered For Jag Saw Puzzle

"No one as yet has applied for the five dollar prize offered for the first complete solution of the Jag Saw puzzle printed in the first issue of the Monthly Jag", said the Editor of the Monthly Jag when interviewed in Winnipeg yesterday afternoon. "I cannot understand this and as matters now stand I have five dollars in American money for the first complete solution handed in to me."

"An amusing incident occurred Saturday morning when the Jag went on sale", continued the Editor. "One of the professors was seen walking toward classes reading a Globe, when a newsboy trotted up to him and said, "Mister, would ya like a Jag?". The professor promptly threw away his paper and feeling in his pocket for a dime bought a Jag. Then he went serenely on his way, laughing heartily at the new literary effort.

"Where are you going and what are your plans for the future?" inquired the reporter.

"I am on my way to the Far East now," replied the Editor. "The League of Nations has commissioned me to put the fear of the Jag into Japan and other pressing reasons made it almost imperative that I leave Kingston."

"Maxim Litvinoff the Soviet Russian Commissar has offered me a chancellorship in a Russian University if I agree to go to Russia and cheer up the Russians so that they won't go rushing off somewhere else. The Japanese Diet has been invoked with a view to seeing how the Jag will affect the daily life of the Japanese. Jehol province offers me a rear-admiralship, but I don't think I will accept it. The last time I went overseas as nurse-maid to a lot of cows I didn't get on so well. The only place where I am without honour seems to be in Kingston.

"However," concluded the Editor of the Jag, "you may bet your Grandmother's eye teeth that I won't be out of work much longer. I nearly got seven days hard labour for riding the rods into Winnipeg and as things are now it looks as if I am going to work my way West."

A recent advertisement tells us that germs will live on merrily in a handkerchief in spite of boiling water. But even if the little critters could survive the soap, hot water, and boiling nitric acid that our local laundry-man uses they'd die from sheer rough handling.

Another Jag Edition On Sale To-Morrow

Eager purchasers bought the entire issue of "The Monthly Jag" soon after it appeared on the campus last Saturday. Nearly four hundred copies were sold in fifteen minutes. One hundred and eighty "Jags" were sold at the Junior Prom on Friday night and the rest of the edition was completely sold out by 9.15 a.m. on Saturday morning.

The publishers announce that another edition of "The Monthly Jag" will appear on the campus to-morrow and advise students desiring a Jag to buy one immediately.

Newsboys reported no difficulty in selling "The Jag," is was learned yesterday. One enterprising youth reported that he sold fifty copies in five minutes to students in the corridor of the New Arts Building. Other newsboys had similar stories to tell regarding the new venture.

The first newsboys appeared on the eampus at 8.45 a.m. and took up strategic positions. Several posted themselves on Union street and on University Avenue. When students began coming to elasses for the nine o'clock session they were met by eager boys offering "The Monthly Jag" and from then on until the edition was all sold out, sales were made just as rapidly as copies could be handed out. By 9.15 most of the boys were back at the Jag headquarters clamouring for more Jags.

Sales at the Junior Prom. were similarly brisk. Two well-dressed boys appeared among the revellers during the first supper and began selling the new magazines. The attractive cover and make-up of the new periodical made their task easy and in half an hour they had sold all their Jags and gone home.

Bach Operetta To Be Presented To-Night

Climaxing over a month of preparation the Peasant Comic Operetta of Bach will be presented in Grant Hall at 8.15 this evening.

The program is moderately long but well balanced, combining vocal and instrumental numbers with ballet dancing. The first part featuring a Women's chorus is auspicious, commemorating as it does, the centenary of the birth of Johannes Brahms and the semi-centennial of the death of Richard Wagner.

In the interim before the comic Operetta a quartet of four violins (Misses M. Arbuckle, P. Gummer and Messrs. P. Miranti, P. Carlinsky) will be heard in a selection from Wagner's "Lohengrin."

After this the Comic Operetta with ballet and orchestral accompaniment and a chorus of fifty voices will be presented. Mesdames Gilmour and Tracy are the soprano leads; Messrs. Sparks and Percival the tenor and baritone parts respectively.

The Operetta is produced by Robertson Davies, conducted by Prof. H. L. Tracy. (Mrs. A. R. B. Williamson, pianist.) For the dance numbers Miss Phyllis Knight will be at the piano.

Recovery Of Caustic Soda Lecture Topic

The recovery of waste Caustic Soda in the Artificial Silk Industry will be the topic discussed by D. J. Eynon, Chem. Eng. '31, at the next meeting of the Chemical Engineer's Club. This meeting will be held on Thursday, March 9, in the Chemical Engineering Dept., Ontario Hall, at 4 p.m.

In the Viscose process of Artificial Silk manufacture, caustic soda of high purity is always used, and as much as fifty tons a week used to be lost in the waste liquors from the process. By the utilization of Ceini Dialysers this loss is being decreased to a great extent.

Mr. Eynon is in the Research Dept. of Courtland's Artificial Silk Factory in Cornwall. He has been investigating the performance of this new process for the recovery of caustic soda, and his lecture on Thursday will be based on his findings as regards the Theory, performance and Economics of these Cerini Dialysers.

All students interested in this subject or in any other branch of Chemical Engineering are invited to attend.

Actors Needed For Mob

The producers of the next Dramatic Guild offering "Androcles and the Lion" announce that there is an opening for several more young men and women in the cast.

Several mob scenes are included in the play, and the Directorate invites any one interested to form part of the cast for these scenes. Prospective candidates should be at Convocation Hall on Wednesday evening at 7 o'clock.

Guild Play Goes On Boards This Week

Androcles and the Lion, current offering of 'The Guild' goes on the boards Friday and Saturday evenings of this week.

A Journal representative attended a rehearsal on Saturday afternoon and was satisfied that this ambitious production would be in a finished state for its Convocation Hall debut.

Principals have been given considerable notice in previous issues, in particular Hazel O'Kilman, Arthur Sutherland, Lebo Ware and Scarth Macdonnell. All of these actors are expected to enhance their reputation in this latest production.

The cast is extremely large comprising about thirty performers. And during the past weeks it has been necessary to rehearse these people in groups making the production a very arduous one indeed. Miss Violet Kilpatrick deserves credit for her untiring efforts and Mrs. G. B. Reed has been much in evidence during the past week.

Students are assured of an evening full of side-splitting laughter if they attend this production. Coming near exam time Androcles should prove an excellent opiate for the blues.

Many Opportunities In Field Of Dietetics

Mrs. W. A. Campbell, who was formerly Mary Clark, a daughter of Dean Clark, gave a Journal reporter some details of the possibilities in the field of Dietetics when interviewed after the recent Fireside Talk on that subject. Mrs. Campbell said that general hospital work presented the best field in Ontario both from an economic standpoint and from the larger number of positions available. Other branches of dietetic work such as teaching in schools, which involves an extra year in the teacher's training courses, and tea room positions which demand a large capital backing, are very enjoyable, Mrs. Campbell said, but have these disadvantages.

In answer to a question concerning the relative popularity of the different types of dietetic work, Mrs. Campbell said that although it was difficult to tell which were the preferred positions, many graduates went into hospital or hotel work. The salary range for this type of work was generally higher and beginning at $1800 reached a maximum of $2200.

When asked about particular hospitals in which to do post-graduate work, Mrs. Campbell said that most large hospitals have pupil courses but she mentioned particularly the Royal Victoria and Montreal General Hospitals in that city and the Toronto General Hospital, and also said that the Kingston Hospital was offering a postgraduate course. Speaking of American hospitals Mrs. Campbell said that the Presbyterian Hospital in New York and the John Hopkins Hospital offered excellent courses although it is hard for Canadians to enroll there now.

Great Musician's Sprightly Cantata Ably Performed

Comic Operetta Under Auspices Of Glee Club Proved Great Success

On Tuesday evening, Mar. 7th, the Levana Glee Club, supported by a male chorus, orchestra and ballet, gave a very uprightly and pleasing rendition of Bach's Peasant Cantata, which shows the famous composer in a light and jolly vein. The program opened with God Save the King and followed with a march from Wagner's Lohengrin, played on four violins. The performers were the Misses Arbuckle, P. Gunmer and Messrs. P. Miranti, and P. Carlinsky. A short introduction to the story of the operetta was given by Miss M. Fyfe, who said, in effect, that it was a celebration on the part of the peasants for the birth of a son to the lord and lady of the manor. After some songs and dances in honour of the event, the peasants go to the inn and there further celebrate the affair with 50 flouns given by the lord of the manor.

The scene opened with a brisk march by the orchestra, to which the peasants in their gay costumes marched onto the stage. The chorus sang several gay numbers, interspersed with recitations and arias by the soloists, who were Mrs. S. M. Gilmour, Mrs. H. L. Tracy, Mr. J. A. Percival and Mr. R. E. Sparks. Mr. Percival excelled in the aria, "Good Fellow Be Merry" and was heartily encored. His voice was well suited to the part, being broad in range and of a pure tone. Mrs. Tracy received warm applause for

Coast Of Hudson Region Described

In a lecture well illustrated, W. Gussow told the Miller Club about the "Hudson Bay Coast Region" at a meeting held last Wednesday afternoon in Nichol Hall.

Mr. Gussow outlined the trip taken by the Canadian Geological Survey last summer up the Hudson Bay Railway to Fort Churchill and from there to Eskimo Point and Padley. He explained that in one hundred days out, the party was delayed forty-eight days by winds and rain and that they only had thirty-two days of active survey work.

Many interesting things were seen on the trip. White whales would come into the Bay in schools and in the distance they looked like a number of white caps on the water. These whales are six to fifteen feet long and are a source of food for the Eskimoes who eat the blubber raw. Seals and caribou are also in abundance, one herd of the latter being over twenty-five thousand strong. The Eskimo huts are made of cariboo hides and the Eskimoes dress in heavy "parkas" to protect themselves from the climate which in general is very cold and raw especially along the Coast where the winds blow in off the cold waters and ice of the Bay.

The geology of the region taken as a whole is flat lying and few actual outcrops can be observed due to the action of the ice in breaking the rock up into boulders and mud. The ice in freezing expands and heaves up the rock. It then scrapes and flattens off the boulders so formed. Some of the rocks have been heaved up as much as twenty feet. Pillow lavas were observed in some places along the Coast and at Padley there was an outcrop of white Quartzite. Mr. Gussow mentioned that he had found a boulder of fresh granite on the shore and wondered where it came from because most of the rocks of the Region are gneissic in character.

Near the shore it is quite shallow and in some places when the tide goes out the water recedes a matter of six miles. Because of the shallow waters and shoals the Eskimoes travel around in kayahs which are made of skin and are practically unsinkable because the tops are also covered, only a small space being left in the

An evening of nineteenth century German music was presented before the Music Group of the Kingston Art and Music Club at the March recital held on Wednesday evening in the show rooms of C. W. Lindsay and Company, Limited. Harold S. Packer had charge of this program.

The evening opened with "Concerto No. 3 in C Minor", Op. 37, (Beethoven) played by Miss Lenore Black, solo piano, and Harold S. Packer, orchestral accompaniment for second piano. 'Andy' And The Lion Will Frolic Together As Guild Play Goes On Boards To-Night

To-night and to-morrow night "Androcles and the Lion," comedy-satire offering of the Dramatic Guild, will be presented in Convocation Hall at 8.15 p.m.

On each evening before the curtain rises, Professor Roy will speak on the Preface, of which an understanding is necessary to appreciate the full significance of the play. For the famous dramatist whose works are "both a preface and a play" wrote a particularly witty and characteristically provocative preface to "Androcles and the Lion", and Professor Roy's remarks on this subject are expected to arouse great interest.

Mrs. G. B. Reed is confident, the Journal has been informed, that the actors are 'tuned to concert pitch' for this evening's performance. Even the supers have been carefully rehearsed in their parts. Anyone attending Androcles is assured of a mirth-provoking evening.

The unusually large cast that has been assembled for this presentation has afforded the Dramatic Guild an excellent opportunity to take advantage of most of the dramatic talent contained in the Club, and in more than one instance unexpected "finds" have been made by the Directorate in their search after actors complete the cast.

A side-splitting animal burlesque starring Hazel O'Kilman, Scarth Macdonnell, and R. W. Shannon (as the lion): moments of ardent love-making with Arthur Sutherland and Lebo Ware as principals; scenes seething with scornful satire—all this is woven into the fabric of Shaw's play. The production is enhanced with original costumes and a large crowd of Christian men, women, slaves, and soldiers form a traditionally colorful background against which the main action of the play is worked out in the inimitable Shavian manner.

The Publicity Manager stated to a Journal representative yesterday that tickets had been going briskly all this week but that a few were still available for sale.

Rabbi M. Eisendrath Will Speak At Queen's

Plans were set under way by the Executive of the International Relations Club to bring to Queen's Rabbi Maurice Eisendrath of Holy Blossom Synagogue, Toronto. Rabbi Eisendrath is very well known because of his excellent social work in Toronto and also for the high quality of his weekly radio addresses. He has been acclaimed in superlatives by the press, Kiwanis and Rotary Clubs, Public Forums, and outstanding churches of all denominations. Present arrangements are that he will speak in Convocation Hall on Tuesday, April 4. The lecture will be open to students and to the general public.

Next Tuesday, March 14, Professor Rogers is to address members of the International Relations Club on the subject "The League of Nations and the United States." Notices will be sent to those concerned advising them of the meeting place.

The annual banquet is to be held on Friday, March 24th in the top floor of the Students' Union. Principal Fyfe, the honorary president of the club will be the guest speaker of the evening. His usual wit and brilliancy should act as an incentive for a complete turnout. Tickets to the banquet are available from any member of the committee and are priced at 25 cents for paid up members and 50 cents for others. The executive is composed of Phil Stuchen, George Wallace, D. A. Grant, M. L. Rapoport, Miss Jessie Ward and Ken Ruffman.

Arts And Medicos Must Re-Play Game

Medicals Protested First Game Results

As a result of the protest lodged following Wednesday's Interfaculty game between Arts and Meds., which was won by Arts, and protested by Meds, the powers that be have decided that a second game shall be played to determine the winner.

While a ruling of Dutch Dougall's was the direct cause of the protest, it was Dutch's letter that influenced the board in deciding upon another battle. Dutch felt that there was a good deal to be said for the Medical side of the argument and rather than have any ill feeling over the game, he recommended a playoff.

This argument will only serve to swell the crowd on Friday when the teams meet for they are as evenly matched as any two squads can be. The game will be played from three to five p.m.

The first encounter between these two teams was hard fought throughout, and judging from the play another torrid tangle is assured. Both teams will be out to establish their superiority.

Meeting Of Arts Levana And Theology Termed "Triple Marriage Of True Minds"

The recent joint meeting of the Arts - Levana - Theology Societies held in Convocation Hall, to quote the guest chairman, Dr. Fyfe, was indeed " a triple marriage of true minds." The large and enthusiastic audience enjoyed the varied program. Four members of the Faculty Players presented a short comedy, "The Finishing Touch" in which Mrs. Fyfe starred as the garrulous and inopportune visitor. Mrs. Hugh Walpole as the anxious young hostess, gave a delightful interpretation of the role. The appreciation of the executives of both societies was expressed by the presentation of bouquets of spring flowers to Mrs. Fyfe, Mrs. Walpole and Miss Brooks.

At the conclusion of the play, refreshments were served, after which Professor Knox, the honorary president of the Arts Society, gave a short and reassuring explanation of the present American banking situation.

Miss Hilda Landon, president of the Levana Society, announced the results of the Levana Society Elections, in which Miss Mary McLennan was elected to the presidency of the new executive.

Three members of the Dramatic Guild presented as the final offering of the varied program, a comedy in the manner of the Horrors of the grand Guignol. Mrs. Roland Browne as Mimi, Walter McLaren as Boko and Bill Wilgar as Pierre were the comedy trio in this presentation. The Arts and Levana Societies are being congratulated upon the success of the meeting.

Silicosis Problem To Be Outlined By G. C. Bateman

Mining Association Official To Address Metallurgists' Club

G. C. Bateman, Secretary of the Ontario Mining Association will speak to members of the Mining and Metallurgical Club at 4.15 this afternoon in Convocation Hall. Silicosis is the subject of Mr. Bateman's address and it is also expected that he will make some remarks on Canada and the gold standard.

Mr. Bateman graduated from Queen's University in 1905 and since that time he has been actively connected with Canadian mining enterprises. For a number of years he was general manager of the Larose Mines in Cobalt and in 1924 he was appointed Secretary-treasurer of the Ontario Mining Association which position he now holds.

Mr. Bateman has been actively connected with the University since his graduation and is a member of the University Council. Last year he succeeded Dr. MacIntosh Bell as president of the General Alumni. Also he was a member of the building committee which was responsible for the erection of Miller Hall and the New Gymnasium.

Silicosis is a disease which is caused by men working underground in mines, breathing silica dust. It is sometimes called "miner's consumption" and its effect is not manifest until a man has been exposed to silica dust for about nine years. At the present time it has become so prevalent that the Compensation Board is paying over $2,000,000 a year to men affected with the disease. So, economically, it has become an important factor in the Canadian mining industry. Mr. Bateman has spent a number of years studying silicosis, and is now a Canadian authority on the subject

A special invitation to hear this address is extended to the Medical and Engineering Societies, and also to any other students who may be interested.

JOURNAL MEETING

A meeting of the Journal staff will be held at the Journal Office, Students' Union, Saturday, at 1.15 P.M., at which time officers for the coming year will be chosen. The staff is asked to turn out "en masse".

Dr. G. B. Reed was the guest speaker at the meeting of the Natural History Club held yesterday afternoon, in the Old Arts Building. Dr. Reed chose as his subject for the occasion "Beginnings of Bacteriology."

A good attendance was on hand to hear Dr. Reed's lecture.

Debacle In Sports

With the defeat of the Juniors in the hockey play-offs the sports season at the University came to an end for another year. Looking back over the headlines of this depression ridden-year, from the angle of sports, Queen's has decidedly reached a new low level. In only two occasions have championships come to the University through the efforts of Tricolor clad performers. Doreen Kenny's victory in the Women's Intercollegiate Tennis Tournament, and Doug Grant's sensational march to Dominion honors in the men's Senior badminton tourney stand out as the only Queen's successes in an active season. Doug's great win has been justly heralded as one of the outstanding victories of the season, while Doreen's success in the tennis tournament brought to Queen's a title which, as far as we have been able to learn, has never been won by a Queen's player before. These triumphs alsone would be enough to make a sports season an outstanding success. But is not natural to ask why other sports have fared so badly this year?

One answer presents itself immediately—we are in the process of building for the future. This is true of practically every team representing the University this year. The rugby team, handicapped by the graduation of no less than ten players, could not hope to annex an Intercollegiate title with a group of players coming together for the first time. Even this would have been minimized to a small degree had the boys been handled by a competent coach, and given a new set of plays. Hockey has suffered immesurably by the lack of proper competition. Students will never give of their best as long as they are grouped with such colorless performers as they were this year and last. In our opinion hockey has also suffered from the lack of serious coaching. It might be argued that this criticism is unfair in view of the showing the Juniors made in the play-offs. But we agree with the many hockey fans who have told us that the competition until the team met Newmarket was of questionable calibre. This is not said to dampen the plaudits which have been accorded this valiant little team.

Queen's followers were not a little surprised by the unsuccessful showing which the B. W. F. team made in Montreal at the annual assault. Here is perhaps the best example of a squad building up for the future. Coaches Jarvis and Bews had freshman talent to work with for the most part, and it is generally agreed that their charges made vast improvements, and will form a powerful aggregation next year.

Queen's was ably represented in a basketball way this year, but McGill carried too much experience for the Tricolor cagers.

While never strong in track Queen's made a creditable showing in the Intercollegiate Track Meet. Way's splendid performance in Toronto justly merits the acclaim which it has received.

What does next year hold in reserve for Tricolor teams?

An Excellent Offering

An evening of side-splitting laughter is assured those who will attend "Androcles and the Lion", the stage attraction to be presented to-night and to-morrow night in Convocation Hall by the Queen's Dramatic Guild.

Rehearsals have been carried out in a determined and business-like manner which augurs well for the success of the play. The work of the directors has been of an arduous nature due to the fact that the production requires a large cast. We learn that thirty performers have been engaging in untiring preparations necessitated by the ambitious undertaking.

An exceptionally able cast have been chosen for "Androcles and the Lion", and students and Kingstonians can be assured of interesting performances.

It is, perhaps, needless to repeat that the author of this comedy-satire is none other than George Bernard Shaw. This should prove to be an added reason for attending the play, as the witty Shavian dialogue should provide an excellent antidote for a sullen and downcast mood.

We are happy to see the Dramatic Guild attempt a work of this nature. Amateur dramatic groups have little to profit by presenting plays of the less ambitious, frothier variety which are usnally handled more effectively by the movies.

We are happy to congratulate the Guild in their latest venture and hope that the students will lend their unreserved support to the forthcoming production.

WITH OTHER EDITORS

Overcrowded Fields

"One hundred and fifty doctors in one large city in the North are in the bread line." "In Boston there is one doctor to every 306 people, and in Philadelphia one to 494," whereas the most desirable ratio is about one to 2000.

The contemplation of these statistics, as they were published in the Journal of the American Medical Association, is enough to give the most optimistic young "pre-med" a few dark moments. Evidently Princeton's embryonic M. D.'s have little chance of building up such tidy fortunes as were laid up by their predecessors of the older generation—no matter how diligently they may labor over their test-tubes and guinea-pigs in Frick and Guyot.

Then what is the use of all this laboratory work and memorizing of Latin names? Why not elect some other department, and go into law, engineering, teaching or business? The point is that these other fields are nearly as badly overcrowded as is medicine. The country has already too many lawyers for any normal times, even though the present depression seems to be nourishing food for those who are already at the bar. And there are too many architects and engineers for any period except one of furious and unbridled over-production, such as we hope may never come again.

It is as Professor Pomfret of the History Department remarked in a recent lecture. Those of the younger generation should not blind themselves with a hopeless ambition to "get rich quick and retire at 50." In the next 50 years there will most probably be highly interesting developments in the fields of political and social reconstruction. It will be a privilege to be alive and able to witness them, but the price of this privilege is that of moderate material well-being.

If there are any at Princeton who are particularly interested in some line of work, but are deterred from preparing for that line of work while they are here, because of a fear of overcrowding in the desired field, they are making only a futile gesture. For it now makes little difference, financially speaking, what field the man enters. Unless he achieves unusnal distinction in his work, he will be able to rely on no more than adequate remuneration. There is only one valid criterion on which to base one's choice of a career, and that is one's own personal interest.

What Of College?

The general cry among students in our universities is, "Give us more fun, give us more parties, give us more freedom." How foolish it will seem to them after they have left school and gone out into life in search of fame and fortune. How foolish that they do not see the many opportunities they are throwing away.

What does college mean to these young men and women? To some it seems a place for honest study and endeavour, but to all too many it just means a centralization of social activities. Their two aims are to have a good time and keep from flunking ont of school.

They should consider their school in the light of a training camp fitting them for battles and skirmishes in which they must participate in later years. They will need all their resources, and the more they have at their command, the more likely they are to win. In time of war, young recruits are sent to camp to learn their guns, and, when the time comes, to take their places in the army. The best trained soldiers rise high in rank.

Yet the majority of first year students go to college with one thing in mind, to acquire an education. It does not take long. They join the chant, "Give us more fun, give us more parties, give us more freedom."

—Daily Kansan.

C. I. E. Action Aids University Students

Through the generosity of the Confederation Internationale des Etudiants (the C.I.E.), Canadian students have been extended the privilege of the use of the C.I.E. Student Identity Card, even though the N.F.C.U.S. is not a member of the C.I.E. As its name implies this card is intended primarily to serve as a means of identification—to proclaim to anyone concerned that the bearer is a bona fide student of a recognized Canadian university with membership in the National Federation of Canadian University Students and is therefore entitled to the privileges offered to holders of the card.

These cards were originated several years ago and are well-known in Europe to all transportation, hotel, government and other officials with whom the traveller is likely to come in contact. Student travel in Europe is very wide spread and the business is eagerly solicited by all those catering to the traveller. Taking advantage of this fact, the various national student organizations in England and on the continent negotiated with railways, airway and steamship companies, hotels, theatres, museums, immigration authorities and many others, and have obtained from them reduced rates and special privileges for holders of the C.I.E. Identity Card.

The card is looked upon also as a valuable complement to the regular passport because, in identifying the bearer as a student travelling presumably in the interests of his education, it rules out the necessity for strict examinations by customs officials.

At present Canada unfortunately has no special privileges to offer to students travelling within her boundaries, and therefore these cards are obviously of use only to those intending to cross over to the British Isles or Europe.

Full information regarding the advantages offered by these cards and regarding the procedure necessary in procuring one may be obtained from the Travel Secretary of the N.F.C.U.S.—A. Gordon Burns, University of Toronto. The C.I.E. charges a fee of one dollar for each card.

DARTMOUTH COLLEGE—One of the college's traditions was recently broken. The clock in Dartmouth hall has never stopped since it was installed in 1769. Two students stole the 72 pound pendulum. They were pursued by the police for several blocks, but at last they were overtaken and the pendulum restored.

OHIO STATE UNIVERSITY—Approximately 350 books have been donated to the University hospital since it has started its new project of collecting such recreational material, to say nothing of the jig-saw puzzles, checkers, and playing cards. It is believed that the plan will improve the morale of the patients.

UNIVERSITY OF AKRON—Students of the university may borrow and use the movie equipment of the University at any time. They may use the camera to take pictures of the houses or chapter groups, and the projector is to show pictures after they have been taken.

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA—A. G. Ruggles, professor of entomology, who directed the controlling of grasshoppers in 57 countries, found that the cost for the state was $240,000 and it yielded a direct return of $8,130,000 in the value of crops saved.

Letter To The Editor

Dear Mr. Editor.

There is much in the present system of essay-writing which is open to criticism. It is generally acknowledged among students, particularly in English, that their essays are mere syntheses of the opinions of a few standard critical works. Such a process can have no permanent benefit to the student other than the very minor one of a training in self-expression, which training could easily be acquired some other way.

It is very easy for lecturers to assume a complacent air and say that if such be the case, the fault lies with the student. This is not so. On many cases the subjects assigned for essays are so general as to make honest effort impossible. It is manifestly absurd to write essays on trends or elements in style, or on development of literary forms, without a considerable background of reading. Yet this is precisely what the undergraduate is often asked to do. In such a case, he has no alternative, but to follow good Layamon; "Layamon laid before him these books and turned over the leaves . . . (May the Lord be merciful to him), pen he took in fingers . . . and the three books compressed into one."

The remedy for this would seem to be (1) fewer essays with greater stress placed on reading, to encourage the students to familiarize themselves as thoroughly as possible with the literature of the period covered by their course, (2) Essay subjects chosen by the student. In this way, the student would be writing on a subject about which he felt that he had something to say. As it is now an essay is a sort of amorphous hybrid, flung together as quickly as possible, and remembered with shudderings. —M. M.

middle where the person can sit down. Mr. Gussow told that the whale boats of the Hudson's Bay Company were a great convenience in getting aronnd the country.

Up near Fort Churchill there is an old fort called "Prince of Wales" which is larger than Fort Henry at Kingston here. The Fort is now in ruins. It was deserted at the end of the War with the French. In general the features of the Eskimo resemble those of the Indian but the head of the Eskimo is a little larger.

One of the most beautiful sights of the trip was a rainbow showing several orders of red, the whole rainbow being observed since the sun is at such a low altitude. The reflections of the rainbow in the water make almost a perfect ellipse.

Even the ponies are different up there, they eat fish instead of hay.

At the present time the Hudson Bay Company is opening up due to the greatly improved methods of transporation, such as the aeroplane.

UNIVERSITY OF KANSAS—Bill Johnson, center on the basketball team, was honored recently by being used as a model for a story in the January issue of the American Boy.

UNIVERSITY OF ALABAMA—A series of "Dawn Dances" was held at the university for the benefit of those students who study late. The dances ran from six to eight a.m.

S. C. M. Shrapnel

A lecture a few weeks ago told of Russian students receiving pay for attendance at University. Whatever the disadvantages of that method they are not the same as those encountered in the capitalistic countries. One can imagine the increased energy of some students if they were freed from the fear of being "broke" six weeks before the end of the term. "Broke" in the sense that the home coffers are hopelessly empty, as many a farmer's treasury is today. For one without security, too, the Banks and Insurance Companies are unapproachable. That is one worry which does not trouble the Russian student, if his work is diligently done.

By way of contrast, nearly all Canadian Universities raised their fees last fall. This rise in fees followed a summer wherein few students found work. Doubtless the universities had to raise the fees, other sources of revenue being curtailed. Doubtless also, they did it reluctantly since most university authorities have a genuine sympathy for the student's scanty bank account. But apparently we work in a system which makes education difficult to obtain in a financial sense. It might be supposed that a well educated people would know how to meet a difficult situation, or at least better than a people to whom education was denied, yet the malady called depression conspires to limit education, and limit it to those who are least aware of the real condition of the country's people. This depression seems like a disease which aggravates its own condition. And probably the University group is one of those least affected by it.

Syracuse Students Lose Skin During Examination

Syracuse, N.Y. — Manufacture and sale of "cribbing machines" to Syracuse university students seeking aid in passing examinations has been charged here in an investigation of cheating among undergraduates.

For many years students of the College of Applied Science have followed the honor system in examinations. During a recent mid-year examination five engineers taking the course walked out of the examination room, declaring to the professor that they refused to compete against students cheating to pass the test.

There was a rigid investigation by the faculty, who discovered that in colleges not under the honor system cheating in examinations was apparently the accepted thing, with many ingenious methods used. Evidence was obtained that "cribbing machines," consisting of long strips of onion skin paper rolled at either end on match sticks, were sold for $5 to students. The entire course was outlined on the paper and students, by skillful manipulation in the palm of their hands, were able to find the answer to any question asked.

The five College of Applied Science students who walked out of the examination room were commended by the university administration.

Babies

Except to those immediately connected with it, a baby is not so interesting a creature as a puppy or a kitten, but nevertheless the infant of our species shares in that attractive quality which insures the young of all species against neglect, that completely trustful helplessness which arouses the maternal instinct in all old men.

Although not inexpensive, children are more easily possessed than most of the luxurious toys on the market. Much has been said about the problem faced by modern young men and matrons in deciding between a baby and an automobile. As a matter of fact, the choice is very often taken out of their hand by financial or other circumstances. Since it is not easy to acquire an heir on the weekly deposit plan, while an automobile need not be paid for until after it is worn out, the talk among young householders has of late turned more often to connecting rods than cradles, more frequently to piston displacements and comfortable speeds than to triangular upholstery.

It used to be said of babies that "the best people have them" but the truth of such a statement is now open to question. Forward lookers and upward thinkers assure us that the best people are becoming more indifferent yearly to their duty to industry and the army. Public opinion has always been against the promulgation of eugenic theories, which carry with them too much hard common sense to be acceptable to a softened race, and its principles have therefore been denied wide publication but sooner or later the eugenist party will break into open print and become martyrs to their ideals. For the execration heaped upon the dreamers who have yearned for the superman in the past will be as nothing to the fury which will descend upon those who offend both the careless unfit and the indolent eligible of this generation.

The female of the species displays an understandable arrogance over her apparent monopoly of the baby business, an arrogance that is forgivable although it depends upon merely physical attributes, but it is unreasonable to suppose that feminine superiority extends into the field of after care. Nothing is more irritating to an intelligent man than the unanimity with which a group of young and comparitively inexperienced women will believe that he is incapable of even holding a child properly. The truth is that unless one holds it upside down or twists its legs, the child may be safely held in almost any position. And as soon as all-wise nature leaves a mother to her own devices in the matter of feeding an infant, a man must be called into consultation if the creature is to survive with its digestive functions uninpaired, but no woman ever admits that fact.

Our love of babies must always be saddened by the knowledge that they will inevitably grow up and become sophomores, but since they are reasonably certain to appear as a complication in our lives, whether or not we take thought for the future, we must of necessity make the best of them.

Blue Monday May Be Any 'Day For College Students

Everyone has his blue days. For the house wife it's Monday. But for the University student Blue Monday may be any day, according to University faculty members and students.

Prof. Donald G. Barnes, of history believes Monday is the student's poorest day. Years of experimenting with written work has shown him that students are at their best on Tuesdays and that they do progressively poorer work each succeeding day.

Monday Not Poor

Contrary to Prof. Barnes' theory, Lurline V. Simpson, instructor in Romance languages, said, "Monday isn't a particularly poor day for students. It's the day after the night they don't study."

Students themselves disagree over which day the "blues" invade the campus.

Charles Mucha, football star, declared his "bluest day was Thursday after the holiday for Washington's Birthday." He had an 8 o'clock "lab" that day. He also admitted that days on which he wrote blue books were somewhat azure.

Wednesday is Off Day

Other students said that Wednesday was their off day. Friday was declared the dreariest by many students "because there are so many exams."

And so they go, from Monday to Friday. Every day has a tint of indigo for somebody. Yet all is not blue, for some students say they never had a blue day.

UNIVERSITY OF MOSCOW—The University of Moscow will realize a forced reduction of 10,000 in their student rosters in the near future, due to overcrowding conditions and lack of sufficient funds. The edict was issued by the Moscow authorities January 30. The new Russian governmental theories seem to have no telling effects upon administrative problems since the trumped-up technical grounds for ousting students will be poor scholarship and "improper social status."

Daily Kansan Advocates Mimeographed Class Notes

Editor's Note: The following editorial should be of some interest to our readers in view of the stand taken by the Journal on the matter of lecture notes. This article appeared recently in the Daily Kansan, official undergraduate publication of the University of Kansas.

"The lecture method of conducting college classes has met with much approval on the part of students in several educational institutions. They maintain that it is impossible for average students to take accurate notes on everything covered, and that inacurate notes are worse than none at all. Then too, students who are so occupied with note-taking become mechanical stenographers, not real students.

"As a remedy for the situation critics have suggested that professors begin printing or mimeographing their lectures, and passing out copies to members of the class. Obviously, such a system would eliminate the danger of inaccuracy in note-taking, and would enable students to give their undivided attention to what is being said.

"But despite the fact that written copies of lectures would eliminate the evil of inaccuracy, it is also quite probable that the plan would stereotype classroom procedure and make classes so inflexible that they would be dry and boresome. In any case, however, the proposed plan certainly has its points, and might at least be given a try."

UNIVERSITY OF OKLAHOMA—A threat to abolish all fraternities at the University of Oklahoma by legislative action has been made in an effort to stop the activities of a secret organization on the campus known as the "Deep Dark Mystery Club," which was accused of having flogged Bill Stephens, a newspaper reporter.

Meds '34 To Stage St. Patrick's Dance

All taxis will roll towards the La Salle on the 17th of this month, because Medicine, '34 will be hosts to one of the peppiest parties that ever danced the hours away, and all St. Patrick's dances are just naturally full of pep anyway.

Tickets are now on sale for this dance and those who plan to go should speak to any member of the year without delay. Only ninety tickets will be sold, and many more than that craved admission last year at the last minute. They stayed out in the cold.

Don't forget that this isn't just another year dance for an able committee composed of Jack Baker, Bob Ralph. Leo Limoges and Geo. Elliolt have taken full advantage of all the 17th of March means, and decorations, favors and novelties will feature the occasion.

'Warmington's big band will dispense the flats and sharps in ever increasing harmony as the evening glides away and two o'clock will slip around all too early.

Im ensely successful in all their previous year dances, Meds. '34 again invite you to make whoopee on the 17th at their snappy Shamrock Ball at the LaSalle.

Jack (with hands over her eyes) If you can't guess who it is in three guesses, I'm going to kiss you.

Jill: Julius Caesar, Alexander the Great, Santa Claus.

Is There An Urge To Criminal Actions?

Do human beings have an "urge" to commit crime? Are all of us apt to slip off the straight and narrow under certain mental stresses?

Prof. Stevenson Smith of psychology, is searching humanity's mental meanderings for an answer to these questions, by interviewing cases which come up in local police courts.

Given 'Third Degree'

Recently, Edward Dillon, who was arrested and charged with robbery of the Embassy Theatre, journeyed to Professor Smith's offices in Philosophy Hall for a kindly scientific "third degree" as to why he should be charged with a serious crime.

Dillon was accompanied to the campus by his attorney, a deputy prosecutor, and two detectives, but he and Professor Smith were alone during his session as a patient of the psyschology department.

Alone During Quiz

No police officers were present during the inquiry. To secure Dillon's confidence, the psychologist asked that he be left with the unguarded prisoner. Professor Smith guaranteed that Dillon would not escape during the examination.

Professor Smith reported that the case was "unusually interesting." Dillon is a member of a prominent family in Shelton. Results of his confidential questioning were presented in a detailed report to the police today.

her performance of the aria, "Of Flowers the Fairest", and Mrs. Gilmour for "Happy is that Land." Personally, I should have liked to have heard more from these two, but apparently that was not possible. Mr. Sparks had a minor role, but made the most of it. The chorus as a whole showed the result of hard practicing and at no time were they too loud. In fact, the tendency was to the other direction. The children's dances were charming, although at times they didn't just know what to do next. Of the students' dances, the finale gigue was the best performed. The dancers were under the direction of Miss E. Murphy and were accompanied by Miss P. Knight. The orchestra and chorus were both under the direction of Dr. H. L. Tracy, who handled them in his usual capable manner.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY—Drinking in considered a recreation here, and if it is performed in a degree of moderation, nothing is ever said about it.

TULANE UNIVERSITY—According to Dr. John Fletcher, professor of psychology, and considered one of the foremost authorities on defects of speech, stuttering is not due to any faulty vocal apparatus but to "supersensitiveness to social scrutiny." He also found that a surprising number of stutterers have marked literary ability.

CREIGHTON UNIVERSITY—It so happens that smokers obtain higher averages here than non-smokers. The average for smokers was 84.7 and for abstainers, 82.3.

AT THE CAPITOL

MADAME BUTTERFLY
With Sylvia Sydney, Cary Grant, Charles Ruggles

Madame Butterfly is based on the well-known play by David Belasco. It seems a great pity that the directors did not see fit to film Puccini's opera, rather than the drama. The music of the former is very beautiful, and there is so little action in the play that unless it is very skilfully handled it is inclined to drag.

Cary Grant plays the rôle of Lieutenant Pinkerton who, when on shore leave in Japan, weds Cho Cho San, a geisha girl. Having married her according to the Japanese custom, which is not binding, he returns after a short time to America. Cho Cho San, however, forsakes her religion and her parents, believing he will return to her. After three years he comes back with an American wife, and Cho Cho San leaving their child to be brought up according to the custom of her own ancestors, kills herself.

One shudders to think what the movies might have made of such a story, but on the whole it has been done with restraint and thought.

Sylvia Sydney gives an excellent performance as Madame Butterfly. The inimitable Charles Ruggles is responsible for many bright spots. The picture deserves a B++.

AT THE TIVOLI

PROSPERITY
with
Marie Dressler and Polly Moran.

As a service to its readers, the Journal reproduces the rating which was given to Prosperity, now playing a return engagement at the Tivoli, when it was shown in Kingston before. The Journal critic gave the picture a B+, and had this to say about the show:

Marie Dressler makes the best of an overworked plot and produces a comedy worth seeing. She succeeds in getting her audience to sneak out the handkerchief once in a while, but they become almost immediately ashamed of themselves in the humorous result of what started to be a wet scene. The picture drags at times with a lot of unnecessary and mushy sentiment. Norman Foster as John Warren plays in a mediocre fashion, which Anita Page as his wife does not supplement with any extraordinary acting. B+.

UNIVERSITY OF CINCINNATI—Some business men of Cincinnati demanded this university cancel a lecture series on present economic conditions. The complaint is that the gloomy outlook of the professors is having a bad psychological effect on the students.

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO—Questionnaires sent out to 210 of the students who dropped out of the university after one year of the new educational system, only thirty-one ascribed their withdrawal to dislike of the new plan.

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY—The director of the Dearborn observatory at the University recently conducted an experiment at Fryeburg, Me., which further proved Einstein's relativity theory that space is curved near the sun.

By R.M.

Were it not for the fact that people are forced to make their salaams to convention for fear of social ostracism they might manifest a great deal more of the conflict between nature and custom which smoulders in many a human breast to-day. Who of us, on reading the House of Commons Debates, has not seethed inwardly at the smugness displayed by our enlightened political leaders amidst financial and industrial chaos? Surely the civil liberties of a British subject demand a fair and judicious hearing when he has constructive suggestions to offer.

All this is by way of prelude to a consideration of Mark Twain as revealed for us in Stephen Leacock's admirable little book published by Peter Davies. The tragedy of Mark Twain's life was that he dared not give free expression to his innermost convictions. And when he did come out with some mordant satire people thought he was just trying to be funny.

Huckleberry Finn lives in most readers' minds as Mark Twain's masterpiece. It belongs to the most epoch-making period of the author's life; to the days when he piloted mule-driven freight-boats down the Mississippi and reigned supreme in the wheelhouse. But even in this book one hears the note of tragedy sounding above the frolicsome exploits of Huck and Nigger Jim.

A. C. Ward in his recent book on "American Literature," verbally pummels Mark for his facetious treatment of European art relics and the Arthurian legend in "The Innocents Abroad" and "A Yankee at the Court of King Artlur." If Mark Twain was "disastrously insensitive," Mr. Ward manifests a hyper-sensitiveness in his critical comments on these books. What are the odds anyway as to whether they are a jumble of skewgee observations and historical anachronisms or not? The reader 'gets just as big a laugh' out of them now as ever. Anyone who has seen the film version of "A Yankee" will agree that as pure burelesque it stands alone.

Not the least interesting episodes in Mark Twain's life were connected with his public speeches. Mr. Leacock has given us a rare morsel in his biography; the scene is a military dinner in honour of General Grant; the time, 2 a.m.; the topic, ladies.—

"And now in his cradle somewhere under the flag the future illustrious commander-in-chief of the American armies is so little burdened with his approaching grandeur and responsibilities as to be giving his whole strategic mind at this moment to find out some way to get his big toe into his mouth, an achievement to which (meaning no disrespect) the illustrious guest of the evening also turned his attention some fifty-six years ago,—

'Here Mark Twain paused.'

"And if the child is father of the man, there are mighty few who will doubt that he succeeded."

'The house came down with a crash.'

Up to the year 1894 Twain's career reads like a fairy tale. Honours were heaped upon him: he lectured everywhere; published book after book with astounding success; and was even M.A'd by Yale University. But then came the failure of the publishing firm of Charles Webster and Co., scattering Mark Twain's fortune to the winds of Heaven. In those days a man didn't go into a bankruptcy court and get himself declared insolvent; he started at the bottom and worked until he had honourably discharged his debts. That was what Sir Walter Scott did; likewise with Mark Twain. By 1900 the cloud of debt had lifted but a veil of misery enshrouded his heart for his daughter (Susie Clemens) was dead.

Wednesday afternoon, March the 22nd at 4 o'clock, a meeting of the Miller Club will be held in room 210 of Miller Hall at which a lecture will be given and then the election of officers will take place for the ensuing year.

Letter To The Editor

Dear Mr. Editor:

Science to the fore! I would like to claim some of your valuable space to endorse the recent stand on compulsory attendance at lectures taken by the final year in Science.

Traditions and outworn conventions die hard. But the must of antiquity should not be allowed to blight the academic life of this University, and it is high time that the unnecessary and annoying compulsory attendance rule be done away for all final year men.

What purpose does the existing regulation serve? Are the authorities so paternally minded that they feel constrained to run this University as though it were a high school in which the students had not yet attained years and ways of discretion and responsibility? Or is it simply that they just can't be bothered to change a rule which is self evidently a nuisance, and an obstruction to the self reliance of undergratuates?

Perhaps they may be able to answer this query. Certainly no one else can do so.

Yours, etc.,
Chrysogonus.

INTERFACULTY HOCKEY SERIES UNDERWAY

Fourth Year Medicals Win Hockey Crown

Medicine finally settled the inter-year hockey race on Tuesday afternoon, when Fourth year cked out a 1 to 0 victory over Fifth year to retain the laurels.

It wasn't such a hot struggle to watch, but the boys turned out to cheer on their respective heroes, and the wisecracks more than aided in making the hour an entertaining one.

You should not gallop away with the idea that a 1 to 0 score always indicates a close game, because the struggle staged yesterday was far from being the nip and tuck affair the score hints at. Fourth year had a decided edge on the play and should have won by a much greater margin. They proved to be much speedier skaters than Fifth 'year and one or two of their men having been in training for B. W. & F. or somethin', revealed too much pep for the seniors.

If we must write of the game we can dismiss it with a very few words because while Fifth year gave everything they had to make the contest close, they lacked the speed and finish of Meds. '35. A lone goal by Toughy Glass, gave them the verdict. This goal was let loose somewhere outside Meds. '34 defence, and was the easiest shot of the hour that Bernstein in the Seniors nets had to handle. It slipped in however, through a tangle of legs and Irish cannot be called for that one.

Fourth year really ought to have [illegible] for grand larceny or highway robbery or something. [illegible] to comply [illegible] goals from [illegible] sensational display of [illegible] that the rink has seen in many a lunar month. Fifth year did not have a great deal of trouble in getting the puck up as far as Irish's territory, but from then on it was awful going, and they looked plenty bad on numerous occasions as Irish slid, slithered, leaped and flopped to keep the citadel clear.

At times Irish made the opposing boys look extremely foolish as they tried to get the rubber in behind him, and the crowd got a huge thrill out of the efforts of Fourth year. It was a great day for Cochrane and the journals of that town can please copy this tribute to their townsmen.

Meds. '34 turned out a hard fighting team, but they were not in condition to do themselves justice. Galway was missing from the lineup and his presence would have bolstered the team a lot. With Irish doing the miracles we might have won. Robby Clark, Morrison, McGowan, Earle and Baker played very well with O'Connor, McKee and Mutrie showing up at times. Joe Josephson donned skates, but manager Gorman had him chained to the bench.

Johnson, Peever, Glass, Bews and Teskey starred for Fourth year. McCarthy played well in goal but hadn't much to do.

Literature Is Reflection Of Life Says Prof. Alexander

"Literature is a reflection of life and all great writers were in contact with many human activities. It follows that sports writing, dealing with subjects such as prize fights, may be literature."

So stated Professor H. Alexander, of Queen's English department, in his illuminating talk before the Kiwanis Club recently.

The speaker dipped briefly into classic literature for the first illustration of the part played by sports events in letters. He read from an historic account of a deadly encounter between a Greek man-about-town and a community bully which fairly reeked of bruises and blood.

Equally interesting were excerpts in prose and poetry from the works of 19 century writers down to the day of John Masefield, whose interesting description of a clash between two muscular poachers was included in the readings.

English Students Use European Travel Agencies

So long as he remains at home, the Englishman can afford to snap his fingers—at the Gold Standard. The pound may have depreciated, but the cost of living has not increased by a penny and one watches the fluctuations of sterling merely with the same sort of sporting interest that attaches to a cricket match in Australia. But the moment one steps abroad, a very different state of affairs holds good. And so in these somewhat difficult circumstances English students are in increasing numbers making use of the various special facilities which are fortunately open to students on the Continent, and the Travel Department of the English National Union of Students is making it its business to assist them in every way possible.

In several European countries, the local students have established camps where the cost of living is almost absurdly low. Still better for anyone who wants a sightseeing holiday are the tours which can be made by using Youth Hostels. Especially in Germany these hostels have reached a very high standard of efficiency. For a shilling a night one is given a clean and comfortable bed. Some of the continental universities own mountain huts and although the individual foreign traveller is not as a rule admitted to them, parties can, by previous arrangement, secure accommodation. Parties of students travelling together moreover receive good reductions on the railway fares amounting in some cases to nearly 50%.

Further information on these travel facilities may be obtained from the National Union of Students, 3 Endsleigh Street, London, W.C.1., England.

Money Crisis Finds Students Unafraid

If students throughout the United States have any fear about the recent developments of the money situation, they do not admit it, a survey of the various college and University newspapers shows.

Business and trade channels are open almost everywhere and most of the business men are accepting checks for the exact amount of purchases made. Most merchants are waiting to be sure that the emergency measure is absolutely necessary before they start issuing scrip of any form.

"Dad's place," according to the Daily Californian, "is combatting the money shortage with scrip." This form is the issuance of small slips that will not be acceptable outside, but can be used for purchases with in the shop. Pierpoint Cash in the Oregon Emerald tells of the campus being caught "penniless and cigaretteless," playing havoc with the weekend social engagements. "Coeds reported heavy cancellations of dates," Cash said.

Earl J. Miller, Dean of men, according to the California Daily Bruin, was caught the night before the banking holiday with four cents and a pay check. When a small boy approached him asking for some change, he gave him the pennies. Reports say that he "is still looking for the boy."

Opinions from the Daily Oklahoman show that College students "can take it." Some of the remarks:

"Forewarned is fore armed—and I wasn't forewarned."

"The engineers can build more banks than the lawyers can ever close."

"Oh, gee, now I can get married."

"It's a dirty underhanded Democrats' attempt to discredit the outgoing Republican administration."

"It's a blow rendered doubly disastrous because I had considerably less than $100 in my pocket when I heard the news."

"Suspension of withdrawals will have a salutary effect. My assets are, however quite liquid."

"As far as I am concerned, it's a closed issue."

"And my funds have been held up before."

The Oregon Emerald says that after flurry of excitement the students viewed the "holiday" with calmness. This was the dominating attitude taken by students throughout the nation.

Queen's Junior Cagers Lost Game With K.C.I.

The Juniors dropped their final tilt to K.C.V.I. in one of the hardest fought battles of the season. Queen's seemed to be lost on the small floor at the collegiate and had great difficulty in finding the basket. K.C.I. started out strong and piled up 10 points before the Juniors came to life. At half time the score stood 11-10 for K.C.I. The second half saw some close checking and snappy ball handling, but the baskets were few and far between, and it was not until the last few moments that K.C.I. drew away from the visitors. The final score was 21-14. For Queen's Hephen was best, and was the high scorer. Mateer, McDiarmid and Simmons also were good, the latter checking his man consistently. Mac Thompson was the best for K.C.I.

Letter To The Editor

Dear Sir,—

I hope you will be good enough to allot me a small space in one of your columns. It seems to me that this subject is one which can no longer be overlooked or neglected.

I have a son and daughter now attending Queen's whose descriptions of college activities, both academic and social, are every bit as enraptured as those I carried home to my parents twenty-four years ago. From what I can gather from your columns and those of the Queen's Review the old place is flourishing on an even greater scale than "in my day."

There is one thing I do not like, however, and even though it is of minor importance today it may assume considerably greater proportions in a short time.

I have learned that the professors do, as a general rule (except in the case of Science students) demand a reasonably neat and orderly appearance, from their students. This is an obvious necessity, I grant you, and the wearing of Queen's sweaters in lectures is deplorable. No one in his right mind would tolerate a generally untidy appearance among the students. I commend highly the action of the Levana Society in decreeing that all women shall wear gowns while in the Arts Building. I believe the Society also frowns upon the wearing hats or berets with academic garb; that also I commend. But, should tidiness in a university stop short of the Faculty itself? I have every reason to believe that several of the professors not only neglect entirely to wear gowns themselves, but appear in very untidy old pull-overs which are worn, year in and year out, in lieu of a vest. From an outsider's view point one cannot but wonder whether this is an example of mere ignorance or a mistaken sense of superiority where one is concerned with higher and more lofty pursuits, which make the desire for a neat appearance mere animal mindedness. Do these professors feel they are so concerned with the higher things in life that it is beneath their dignity to appear in classes as half-human individuals? Surely it is not a case of impecuniosity!

How can a professor command respect and attention from his students when he appears before them in a decidedly un-academic manner?

Very truly yours,
ARTS '09.

Letter To The Editor

Dear Mr. Editor:

Students in need of employment for this coming summer will doubtless be gratified to read the letter addressed to Queen's Employment Service, and published in the Journal of March 7.

The commiseration and sympathy extended to students by the writer has a tone of forced sincerity. The solicitous concern for "the kind of thinking that will pass through the minds of these unemployed college graduates" seems to express clearly the incipient fear in the mind of the writer. But the suggestion that students must not "lose confidence in their country or their people" would be indicrous if it were not already insulting to one's intelligence. Confidence in whom? In statesmen oscillating between the iron heel of ruthlessness for those whose mental processes differ from the norm, and the grace of God as our only salvation? In financiers who confess themselves helpless in the march of events? In economists who suggest longer hours and harder work as a panacea to end the depression?

It must surely be nauseating to any intellectually self-respecting student to see such shop-worn inanities paraded for his benefit.

Yours, ready to exchange the sympathy for a little intellectual honesty.

A STUDENT.

"Marriage Of Minds" Enjoyable Occasion

Hear ye! Hear ye! Hear, all ye fat-headed scientists and medicos and despair!

For verily was a grand show perpetrated in the Hall of Convocation on the eighth day of Lent in the year of our Lord one thousand—(aw, it's too long to write it all out). As our revered Principal did remark, that was verily a "triple marriage of true minds." Yea verily he did speak the truth—for where is to be found the true mind if not among those who support Arts-Levana-Theology? Q.E.D.!

In the office of Chairman, Dr. Fyfe did invoke and beg the sympathy of the people for the actors who were about to appear before them. Truly, there was no need! For, what shall it profit a man if he ask sympathy for actors—when his own help-mate is one of them? In truth she did put the finishing touch to the "Last Straw." Then did the people know her as an excellent species of wow and did pay her and Mrs. Walpole tribute in flowers from many florists.

Then were the ears of the people further soothed with sweet music from the hand of one Eileen O'Connor at the console of the mighty Heinzman, until a band of the virgins of Ban Righ did go among them bearing spoonless ices and cookies, and the people grew joyous in their hearts but the co-eds proved themselves piggish with the biscuits, some in truth desiring two or more.

And when the strength of the people was in some measure restored Prof. Knox did explain the situation among the money-lenders of Uncle Sam in truly lucid fashion. And the children of American parents were reassured within themselves.

And the high priestess of Levana then did make communications to the women concerning next year's executive.

At last three individuals did present to the people a stupendous effort called by the name "Paris-Green" in the true manner of the Horrors of the Grand Guignol. And the people did sigh with rapture at the soul-gripping scenes between Pierre and Mimi. Multitudes of finger-nails were separated from their rightful owners when the ruler of Apaches—Babo, le Magnifique did fling himself upn the stage. And great were the cries that arose when the wicked temptress Mimi made her "husband" Bo-bo to die the death by poisoned tripe. For many were the sympathisers to be found who had narrowly escaped a like fate at the hands of the landladies of Kingston. Yea, even the air was rent with sobs as Mimi and Pierre with harrowing pathos resolved to die together or not at all. And the people did worship the actors with tribute and floral decorations. Great was Lee, wife of Browne; great were Walter, son of Maclaren and Bill, Junior to Wilgar.

WISCONSIN UNIVERSITY—Conversational ability is the most importnat factor involved in dating, as shown in a survey of college students. This point was especially important to women. Men require that the women make a good appearance and also that they dance well. The most popular forms of entertainment are dances and movies.

Thought Stimulated By Student Groups

The following article entitled "Stimulation of Student Thought" and written by J. C. Cameron, M.Com., appeared in the February issue of the Queen's Review. The article deals with the student discussions groups at Queen's. The article reads as follows:

In a generation addicted to economic speculation it is not surprising to find Queen's undergraduates interested in the vicissitudes of the economic order. By past generations of students the form of economic organization which has come to prevail in all "advanced" countries was probably regarded as part of their familiar environment — a proper subject for the University instructors, but not among the central interests of the student body. Overtaken by a series of strange experiences during the last few years and constantly seeing reference in the press to Russia's great experiment, the undergraduates of today have become curious; they are trying to account for the dramatic events which have affected so many fortunes.

We should not expect the efforts of the student body to understand so complicated a phenomenon as our economic order to be free from crudities; undergraduates may be ill-equipped to undertake such study. The important fact, however, is that student interest is aroused in topics outside the sphere of special studies. Readers of the Review may be glad to know the way in which this interest manifests itself.

During the past few years the Student Christian Movement has gained ground rapidly at Queen's. Within the last two years interested students have organized at least half a dozen campus "Discussion Groups" under the auspices of the S.C.M., and meetings are held weekly throughout the term. The meetings are well attended by a relatively large proportion of the students from each faculty. At least three of the groups are confining their discussions to subjects dealing with social, economic and international relations. As a rule a member of the University teaching staff acts as group leader. It is not, however, the function of the leader to direct the group at every stage, but rather to act as chairman, opening the discussion by pointing out important factors which ought to receive consideration and attempting to keep the participants from wandering from the points at issue.

The meetings are unconventional, free-and-easy. The barriers of reserve that so often keep a seminar student's thoughts on subjects hid under lock and key are broken down; personal views are aired. In an attempt to attract the attention of his fellows to the necessity for reconstruction of social, economic and international relations, the student expresses his real feelings. On occasion the situation becomes rather embarrassing for the leader as he attempts to confine discussion to pertinent points. In spite of this difficulty, however, he is generally successful in keeping the group from losing its way, and in bringing out what light existing data shed upon the relative magnitude of the important factors. Theories are taken up one by one; a critical analysis is made of the evidence offered in support of each; conclusions regarding the validity of each theory presented are discussed. The group is keenly interested in getting insight into the facts; it cares about theories only as aids towards attaining such insight.

No subject is too big for a discussion group to tackle. The Monetary and Banking Structure, Unemployment Insurance, War Debts, Tariff Policy, Communism, Socialism, Technocracy—all receive attention.

The condition is a happy one. Undergraduates are interested in problems in the solution of which trained minds are necessary—problems with which they as leaders will be expected to grapple in later years. The informal discussion group may be only another "extra-curricular" part of University life, but it is performing an important function. May Queen's do its utmost to perpetuate this condition so that student thought will be invigorated and vitalized!

Co-ed Takes To Trousers

Columbia, Mo.—Marlene Dietrich's trousers for women made their first appearance here today when Dora Lane Nevins, student at Christian College, was seen wearing one of the new suits. Miss Nevins appeared in a suit of pearl grey trousers.

Missouri University and Stephens College authorities said no ban would be placed on girls desiring to wear the trousers. Dean Julia Spaulding said students of Christian College probably would not be allowed to wear them.

UNIVERSITY OF WASHINGTON — Professors in the English and History departments offer a real course in bluffing. They believe that every one has to learn to bluff sometime in his life and that college is a good time to learn, encouraging their students to do it. The "A" students get their averages because they know how to do it fearlessly and well.

INDIANA UNIVERSITY—Ruby Rob Fitzsimmons, heavyweight prize-fighter of twenty-five years ago, made the statementthat football is too dangerous game, even to watch, according to the fieldhouse caretaker here.

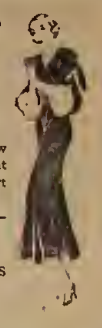
UNIVERSITY OF OREGON—If the university can be bought for cash, a certain Los Angeles business firm will buy it, according to a letter received by the dean of social science.

DENNISON UNIVERSITY—The campus newspaper reported recently that the average male spent an average of 10 cents on a date with a co-ed. The biggest expense was an occasional trip to the picture show.

Hobo Visits Campus

Lafayette, Ind.—The campus of the University was given the "once-over" Tuesday by a visitor who arrived in town via freight car. The visitor was strolling up Indiana avenue, gazing at the beauties of the campus, when he stopped suddenly and cast a quizzical gaze in the direction of a member of the faculty who was walking behind him.

"Are you a stranger in town?" the faculty member asked. The visitor nodded in the affirmative.



"This is the campus of Indiana university," the faculty member informed him.

"Yeah," the stranger said, "I knew it was a school of some sort, but I couldn't figgure out what that grain elevator was doin' there," he added, pointing to the tower of the Union building.

F. D. Roosevelt Airs Views In New Book

New York — Roosevelt, in his book, "Looking Forward," says: "I do not believe that in the name of the sacred word individualism a few powerful interests should be permitted to make industrial cannon fodder of the lives of half the population of the United States."

"I believe that the individual should have full liberty of action to make the most of himself," he adds in the volume that will be published March 10. "I believe in the sacredness of private property, which means that I do not believe that it should be subjected to the ruthless manipulation of professional gamblers in the stock market and in the corporate system. I share the general complaint against regimentation: I dislike it not only when it is carried out by an informal group amounting to an economic government of the United States, but also when it is done by the Government of the United States itself. I believe that the Government, without becoming a prying bureaucracy, can act as a check or counterbalance of this oligarchy so as to secure initiative, life, a chance to work, and the safety of savings to men and women, rather than safety of exploitation to the exploiter, safety of manipulation to the financial manipulator, safety of unlicensed power to those who would speculate to the bitter end with the welfare and property of other people. . . . A mere builder of more industrial plants, a creator of more railroad systems, an organizer of more corporations, is as likely to be a danger as a help. The day of the great promoter or financial titan, to whom we granted everything if only he would build or develop, is over."

Writing on business conditions (prior to the bank holiday), President Roosevelt attributed the situation to "two American-made causes." "The second one, in the point of time, is this Grundy tariff," he writes. "The first one is the fact that by improvident loans to 'backward and crippled countries' we financed practically our entire export trade and payment of interest and principal to us by our debtors. . . ."

The book summarizes the practical future of the land as follows: "Our task now is not discovery or exploitation of natural resources or necessarily of producing more goods. It is the soberer, less dramatic business of administering resources and plants already in hand, of seeking to re-establish foreign markets for our surplus production, of meeting the problem of underconsumption, of adjusting production to consumption, of distributing wealth and products more equitably, of adapting existing economic organization to the service of the people. The country needs and, unless I mistake its temper, demands bold, persistent experimentation. . . . The millions who are in want will not stand by silently forever while the things to satisfy their needs are within easy reach."

Hockey Winners Celebrate

The Hockey Team of Arts '35 held a select celebration party yesterday evening to commemorate their victory in the interyear hockey.

It is learned that there were also present certain members of the executive.

After a most enjoyable evening had been passed the revellers returned home in the small hours, having successfully liquidated the depression and again demonstrated their belief in the prospects and potentialities of Arts '35.

Jag Editor To Attend Guild Play Despite Arts Court Reward For Apprehension

The Editor of the Jag announced this morning that he would attend the performance of "Androcles and the Lion," in Convocation Hall this evening. This statement followed fast upon a report that the Arts Concursus has offered a reward for information leading to the exposure of the Jag Editor or any members of his non-existent staff. A reward of two "Monthly Jags" will be given to persons furnishing the Arts Court with the desired information.

J. JAG JAGSON

Editor of the "Monthly Jag" who will be guest of honor at the play "Androcles and the Lion" to-night. Mr. Jagson is also a famed lion hunter.

"I am determined to go through with it, at all costs," declared the Editor of the Jag, when interviewed this morning. "The Dramatic Guild has sent me a complimentary ticket for the performance of "Androcles and the Lion" and naturally, business being as it is, I can't pass up an opportunity like this without deep consideration. After all we literary men have to stand together and I feel highly honored that the directorate of the Dramatic Guild has sent me a complimentary ticket just as if I were G. B. Shaw myself. I'll be on hand at 8.15 to-night along with the rest of the big literary hugs. Any person who has managed to solve my famous Jag Saw puzzle can hand in the solutions to me but of course it won't be any use as the contest was officially closed on Wednesday night."

Questioned as to why he did not continue his trip to the Orient the Editor seemed at first unwilling to make any statement but finally divulged the fact that he had left the water running in his landlady's bathtub and remembering this on his arrival in Winnepeg hastened back to turn off the faucet. "No freight trains have stopped here since I arrived back," he said, "so I could not continue my travels."

"Well, so long, reporter," concluded the Editor, waving your reporter a fond adieu. "I guess I can sit with the quality to-night after all. The Dramatic Guild is defeating its own end in a way because to tell you the truth I had planned to join up as one of the Christians or racketeers in the mob scenes. And I would do justice to any loin cloth."

Nineteenth Century Music Heard By Kingston Club

Miss Black and Miss Appleby are pupils of Mr. Packer.

Mrs. Lottie Sanders Wyatt sang two groups of songs which included "Since Mine Eye Beheld Him" (Schumann), "Litany", (Schubert), "O, Ring Upon My Finger!" (Schumann) and a Brahms Group — "Little Dustman", "Love Song" and "The Discomfited Suitor."

A violin concerto played by Miss Muriel Arbuckle with Miss Lenore Black at the piano was also on the program. Miss Arbuckle played "Concerto in G Minor" Op. 26 (Bruch).

This was the last regular recital of the season but a junior recital will be held later this month, a public recital will be held in April and the usual competition among choirs of the city schools will be held late in May.

Queen's Journal Celebrates Diamond Jubilee

History-Making Edition Strange To Modern Eyes

The first issue of the Queen's Journal appeared on October the 25th, 1873, and was very different from the paper as we know today. Its streamer bore the words "Queen's College Journal," and that awe-inspiring motto "Sapientia et Doctrina Stabilitas." Like the editors of the Monthly Jag, the staff of 1873 unkindly refused to give us even a hint as to their identity. Instead of the stories of debates, rugby games and formals which find their way into the columns of our Journals, the front page of Volume One, Number One is adorned solely with a poem entitled the mystery of the Jewels. The verses are very beautiful but rather strange and begin:

"Strange children of the dark and gloomy mine
Like vestal virgins in that mystic fire
Which is the source of your effulgent rays."

Looking through the initial issue, on page 2 we discovered "Meditations on food: Historic, Aesthetic and General." This proved to be a well-written and rather humorous article on various culinary matters throughout "this terrestrial sphere." The writer was evidently somewhat of an epicure, for he continued the subject for several issues and by November, 1873, was discussing the advantages of dining on locusts and cat-meat.

On page 3 we found an announcement about the Elocution Society, to which the élite of Queen's belonged, and also an account of the A. M. S. meeting. Apparently these meetings were well attended by the entire University, the Freshmen especially "participating very heartily". On this occasion there was a debate "Is tobacco an evil or a benefit to the human race?"

Then followed an account of the Principal's address on University Day, October 17, but there was no mention of the parade and the celebrating which certainly took place.

A poem called "A Freshman's Experience at the Court of Iniquity" seemed more like 1933. The Court of Iniquity was a Concursus for punishing freshmen who pursued the "beautiful belles" of Queen's. Another Freshman was severely chastised because he had worn a top hat to an A. M. S. meeting.

An outline of the Endowment Scheme by which $100,000 was raised within four and a half years, and a brief history of the Queen's Medical School, completed the first issue of the Journal.

We almost omitted to mention the advertisements. There are numerous references to coloured visiting cards "transparent and beautiful, with your name engraved in gold." Co-eds were informed that long-sleeved flannel nighties might be purchased in Kingston.

The striking feature of it all was the extremely literary style of all the stories, and the fact that comparatively little space was given to college activities and a great deal to such general subjects as Canadian Amphibia. Yet there were undoubtedly rugby games and hockey games, not to mention University Days and Conversats to make life interesting.

Ancient Files Show Headline Evolution

Heads and make-up have varied greatly in the Journal through its long career. Captions at the top of stories presented no difficulties to the editors of the early issues. The articles of a literary nature were given simple titles and as no attempt was made to report current happenings or news there was no need for explanatory heads. Scant attention seems to have been given to make-up, for the study of making the pages attractive and bright to the reader, was not very necessary when the Journal was a literary monthly or bi-monthly and the material used did not lend itself to adjustmeut. But when in 1911 the Journal became a bi-weekly the editors were forced to use current news as the supply of literary material could not possibly fill the columns.

Cuts had been used since 1900. Every newspaperman knows that cuts are used for more purposes than showing the reader some pictures. Judiciously placed they make a pleasing break in the monotony of printed columns. In 1907 the Journal published two action pictures taken at Convocation. Professor Miller is shown receiving a degree and Justice McLennan is seen rising to speak. About this time a tendency to use more and more current news is evident and this became more and more noticeable as the years went on until the Journal became a bi-weekly in 1911. In this year the Journal lost its character as a staid literary periodical and began to carry news as well as serious articles. The heads were all of the same size and frequently were supplemented with decks or lines between the head and the story.

Some of the heads are consciously or unconsciously funny. Barber Pole Missing, black capitals, and Alma Mater Society is asked to pay for it, in smaller letters is the caption given to one story. Attempts to balance pages by placing articles and heads against each other were common and the first streamer appeared in 1911. Attempts were made to break up articles and long columns of print.

CONGRATULATIONS

Toronto, Ont., Mar. 15th, 1933.

Editor, Queen's Journal.
Kingston, Ont.

On behalf of the Varsity and the Undergraduates of the University of Toronto may I offer heartiest congratulations to our sister publication on the attainment of the age of three score years. May the Journal continue to make its influence felt for many decades to come.

DECOURCY H. RAYNER,
Editor of The Varsity.

Dear Mr. Editor:

Congratulations on your 60th anniversary. The printing of the Journal has been done by your present printers for over 32 years. They have watched it develop from a fortnightly magazine style, the typesetting of which was done by hand, to a semi-weekly machine-set newspaper style. Over this period we have become very strongly attached to your paper and wish you every success in the years to come.

Sixty Years Of Progress Mark Journal History

In the cold grey dawn of October 25th, 1873, the editor of the first issue of the "Queen's College Journal" staggered out of the office of the British Whig with the glitter of accomplishment in his blood-shot eyes. The impossible had happened! The college paper was now a thing of black and white instead of a mere idea. He wiped a gallon or so of perspiration from the fevered brow which overhung an exceptionally vacant face, and, with a superhuman effort, called a cab!

With unerring precision the Journal had appeared a fortnight late; and such superior standards of journalism have characterized its publication ever since.

Here are a few excerpts from the original Prospectus of the Queen's College Journal:

"The students of Queen's University and College believing that a paper in connection therewith might be established with advantage to undergraduates, graduates, and all connected with the Institution have resolved to take such steps as may best secure the accomplishment of this object.

"The paper will be called the Queen's College Journal. It will be issued fortnightly at the rate of fifty cents for the Academic year of seven months, payable in advance. The first number will appear on the 10th of October, 1873. Its object shall be twofold. Firstly—to foster a literary taste among the students and to afford them an opportunity of giving expression to their opinions on topics of the day. It is also intended to serve as a bond of union between the University and her Alumni, and to sustain the interest of the latter in the prosperity of their Alma Mater, after they have left her halls.

"Secondly—to furnish such information upon College and other matters as will be not only valuable to the student but it is hoped, interesting to the public generally. The 'Journal' moreover is designed to supply the need, felt at present, of instruction in the principles and practices of Journalism, the great practical importance of which has been recognized in several leading Universities in the United States by the establishment of a chair for instruction in this branch of study."

This, you can see, provided for the appearance of the first issue on October 10th instead of the 25th, but such are the trials of Journalism. Even this issue today had to be postponed from Tuesday because it was to be a special anniversary edition!

The "Queen's Journal" was originally a fortnightly publication, got out each alternate Saturday by a special committee chosen by the Alma Mater Society. It remained fortnightly until the year 1909, when it became a weekly. Since 1911 the Journal has been issued twice a week—but it has never as yet aspired to the daily class.

From a good sized pamphlet the Journal became a smallish magazine, and has now advanced sufficiently to become a full-sized newspaper of eight pages.

In its original unsullied form the Journal cost fifty cents for an academic year's subscription and sold also for five cents the single copy.

Sixty Years Of Service

Sixty years of uninterrupted service is the proud claim which the Journal celebrates to-day as the last issue of the fifty-ninth Volume comes off the press, ushering in the Diamond anniversary of the official publication of the Alma Mater Society of Queen's University.

In order to commemorate this occasion we are happy to present to our readers a special issue in which is featured several articles of an historical nature, cuts of outstanding teams, and groups, and other landmarks in the colorful growth of the University. We are also happy to print some of the congratulatory messages which we have received.

Leafing the pages of back numbers of the Journal and scanning the headlines leaves us with one clear impression — the publication has ever striven for progress in every department. A vigorous spirit of advance has marked the efforts of past years. As described in a striking news story on the front page the history of the Journal has been one of exciting moments, of momentous decisions, and of determined progress. Starting as a fortnightly publication in 1873, and printing articles of a literary nature only, the Journal carried on as such until 1909, when the amount of copy available and the increase in the number of students wisely resulted in altering the policy of the paper and making it a weekly. It was also about this time that news items began to appear in the Journal. As a medium of literary expression it had served well and would continue to do so, but it was felt that it should also become more of a mirror of student activity, in which interesting events, the results of sports encounters and student opinion would find a place. Prompted by a continual increase in the student registration and, no doubt also, by a wish to render the student body a greater service by providing them with a more adequate outlook for expression the Journal did not long remain a weekly, for in the year 1911 the paper blossomed out into the semi-weekly class, from which conditions have contrived in preventing further expansion. Perhaps the only notable changes since 1911 have been the dedication of the paper as a news publication entirely, and, we feel sure, it has become a more powerful, a more valuable, a more serious, and a more attractive newspaper.

Expansion has not been easy we may rest assured. The growth of the Journal has only been bought at the cost of hard work, many trials, many ephemeral successes which often came crashing to the ground like a house of cards struck by some unsympathetic and misunderstanding hand. Perhaps what caused the most anguish for our forgotten predecessors was the antagonistic feeling, the selfish and narrow outlook which is ever present to oppose honest, and conscious endeavour. Editors of bygone days were not alone in having to countenance such a stagnant spirit. The price of endeavour has ever been costly.

While within recent years the size of the paper has not changed, the aggressive spirit of the staffs which have successively shaped the destinies of the Journal was not wanting. Attempts have been made constantly to improve the appearance of the paper. Make-up and variety in the headline types have been watched carefully with the view of making the final product as interesting and as attractive as possible.

But the end of the road has not been reached. There is still room for improvement, and we are confident that our successors will make a definite contribution to the good of the Journal. It is our fond hope that when the world is visited with better days the Journal may join the daily publication class. There should be no thought of reducing the size of the paper. There seems to be an under-cover campaign going the rounds at present with such a purpose in view. This would, indeed, be a distinct step in the wrong direction, and one which under present conditions is not warranted. We can suggest many expenditures which should be checked before such a move be made. Though many do not realize it, perhaps, the Journal is one of the strongest influences towards a feeling of "bonne entente" among the sister universities. It is the apostle of understanding which goes out on publication days to carry out its salutory mission. It would certainly be unwise to reduce the size of the Journal while another of our sister universities finds it advisable to enlarge its newspaper.

Au Revoir

Issue number forty, the last of the fifty-ninth volume of the Journal, is off the press and another group of much overworked college journalists joins the shadowy ranks of forgotten predecessors, hoping that the few days left before examinations, if used to advantage, will afford sufficient time to prepare for the crucial test, the gauge which will determine whether the student has absorbed enough knowledge during the year to quality for the official recognition bestowed by the University. We are hoping for the best.

Looking back over the year's activities we cannot but conclude that it was a momentous year indeed, and not without its joys and contretemps. The day's mail often brought its quota of stinging criticism, persons whom you considered as friends were not backward in expressing their utter surprise and disapproval with policies which in all sincerity we thought possessed some value.

Such criticism was naturally disturbing in the early days, but as the time goes on one cannot help developing a philosophy regarding criticism, and so must every man who wishes to get something done. The first article in this philosophy is that it is impossible to please everybody, and that in pleasing yourself the job is usually well done. You see this principle working every day. You like Hardy; I like O'Neill; you like Ed Wynn; I like Eddie Cantor; you like blondes; I like brunettes. It is thus an impossibility to please everyone; anyone who tries it is bound to be colorless and futile.

The second article in this credo is that you cannot be guided by the public because the public is fickle and will as soon turn against you as not. After the battle of Waterloo Wellington was worshipped by the English people. A few years later he had to put iron shutters on his windows to keep the same people from throwing stones through the glass.

The third article is that criticism is good for everyone. No matter how well intentioned or careful one may be criticism helps to bring out the best in us. Finally one should always try to give of his best.

As the time to say "Au Revoir" approaches a certain feeling of satisfaction comes over the writer. We have tried to live up to the credo just outlined. We regret the omissions or errors that may have occurred in the paper and extend to the readers a sincere thanks for their tolerance. To those who have rewarded our work with a friendly word we also wish to say that their thoughtfulness has been greatly appreciated. To the staff and to the printers who have worked diligently and have helped to make our work as pleasant as possible, and to those who in any and all ways have co-operated in making our task easier we address a heart-felt expression of gratitude.

We are glad that our motto has been: "Never explain, never retract, never apologize. Get it done and let them howl."

Student Support

The following editorial appeared in the Journal of Dec. 13, 1915. It is especially interesting at this time:

All college papers must depend upon the students for support; without that support they must be a failure. This may be given in two ways, by subscription and by the character of the news items sent in by the regular reporters and by individual students. Now, our subscribers have done their part and our mailing list is not very much smaller than other years, but we have often had some difficulty in filling our columns with matter that will be of interest to the majority of the students. Of course, the managing editor can always fill up with clippings from other publications, a custom followed by many papers, but the result is not always the most satisfactory.

Much has been said during the last three or four years about the Journal, many find that one phase of college activities has been emphasized too much while others have been neglected. We are not attempting to prove or disprove this statement, but we are of the opinion that if the paper has erred in this direction it was the fault of its reporters not of the editors. We are very often obliged to use material which interests only a few students because no one has seen fit to send in copy that would suit the majority.

The students of this University should be particularly concerned with the success of their paper because if it is not successful they are obliged to make good its failures. According to the present system reporters are not paid, and so they cannot be compelled to write as much as if they were afraid of losing their pay-envelope. As a result the paper must depend upon the voluntary support of all the students.

We do not wish to blame any Society that has failed to support this paper in the past but we would like to call the attention of members of the Theological Society, the Aesculapean Society, the Engineering Society, Meds '16 and '18, Science '16 and Arts '16, to the fact that their meetings have been very poorly reported in the past and sometimes not at all. We would be very grateful if a little more attention were paid to this matter in future.

Treatment Of Rickets Outlined By Speaker

A brief history of the treatment of rickets was outlined at the last Fireside Talk when Dr. Bessie Chant Robertson of Toronto was the speaker. Dr. Robertson is a worker in medical and nutritional research, and her lecture was of especial interest to students of biology and chemistry. Various points were illustrated by lantern slides of rachitic animals and people.

"Scientific knowledge on the subject of rickets has been built up gradually, like an intricate jig-saw puzzle," stated Dr. Robertson.

"Rickets first appeared in the seventeenth century, when people began to flock into the cities. Overcrowding in unhygienic surroundings led to great prevalence of this disease and many theories were put forward regarding the cause.

"Heredity, poor food and little exercise, and infection were among the causes suggested. It has been found that rickets is a metabolic disease, which develops when the growth or bone tissue is more rapid than the building up of lime salts necessary to form solid bone. Often the whole skeleton is affected as well as the limbs, and pelvic deformities are particularly serious. Radical operations are often necessary and sometimes unsuccessful.

"Rats are used for experiments in treating rickets, because their food is similar to that of man. Results of experiments show that rachitic subjects are more open to infection than non-rachitic. Until recently the cure for this disease, so prevalent in temperate zones, was unknown. Now Vitamin D, a substance chemically produced, is a recognized cure. This anti-rachitic compound is rarely found in common foods.

"Since 1780 many doctors have advised sun baths as a treatment of rickets, and recent experiments have confirmed their beliefs in the value of the sun's rays.

CAVALCADE

Heralded everywhere as the finest picture ever filmed "Cavalcade" has been blazing a meteoric trail wherever it has played. Kingston will be favored with a four day showing of this picture starting Saturday. The following glowing tribute appeared in a recent number of The Toronto Star:

"At the Royal Alexandria a packed audience felt as though their whole conception of life had changed—because of seeing the film Cavalcade. There were people in that audience who had passed through most of the experiences recorded in that remarkable film; people who had lost sons and brothers and lovers and fathers in the war of 1914-18; veterans who had gone through it and come out of it; veterans of the Boer war, too, marshalled by Col. Barker in the glare of the floodlights, reviewed briefly by the lieutenant-governor as he passed in with the glittering crowd.

"And this film, which is a great series of spectacles, is also a wonderful story. Not often do film spectacles touch the heart. This sequence of civilization-pictures is all skillfully devised by Noel Coward and Frank Floyd, his producer for Fox Films, to play into the lives and characters of a few people."

Journal Staff Elected At Annual Meeting

Edwin H. Lill was elected Editor of the Queen's Journal for the session 1933-34 at the annual Journal staff elections last Saturday afternoon. Eric Gilmour, former News Editor, was elected Managing Editor and Helen Kennedy News Editor.

R. W. Clark, Meds '34 assumes the position of Sports Editor on the new staff. Mary Fraser was appointed Levana Editor with Ruth Boone as Assistant Levana Editor. J. B. Bell was chosen to fill the position of Literary Editor. Connie Grant takes the place of J. D. Bateman, former Exchange Editor who was appointed Arts Associate Editor.

Tom Robinson, Meds '35 and M. C. Robinson were nominated Associate Editors for Medicine and Science respectively.

Recovery Of Caustic Soda Outlined To Chemical Club

At a meeting of the Chemical Engineers' Club, Mr. D. J. Eynon, Chem. Eng. '31, presented a most interesting paper on the recovery of caustic soda from waste liquors by the use of Cerini dialysus.

Mr. Eynon as head of the routine laboratory in Courtaulds silk mill, Cornwall, had been investigating the operation and economics of these dialysus, and his paper based on his findings proved most instructive.

Beginning with a general description of the dialysus the speaker dealt in turn with the theory and the operation in practice of these machines.

The recovery of the caustic soda was an enormous saving to the company and Mr. Eynn showed that these Cerini dialysus paid for themselves inside of three months.

Sixty Years Of Progress Mark History Of Journal

In its sixty years of existence the Queen's Journal has gone through periods of affluence and impecuniosity, trials and tribulations, rises and falls in literary value, but "never to our knowledge has it smacked of yellow journalism, or had to depend upon trash to fill its columns or sustain its circulation. In material and form the Journal has been worthy of Queen's and her students." (This last is quoted from an article taken from the "Queen's Review" for February, 1929.)

In an article on college journalism found in Scribner's, 1878, which was reprinted in the Journal on October 26th of that year, was found the following:

"The purposes which the college paper accomplishes in American life are numerous and important. It is a mirror of undergraduate sentiment, either scholarly or vulgar, frivolous or dignified, as are the students who edit and publish it."

The Queen's Journal has never had reason to fear the application of the test suggested in the above quotation.

Ma-t-a-d (to a girl friend): "Gee, I can get up in five minutes in the morning."

Girl Friend: "Well, it takes me half an hour, but, of course, I wash."

Y-U-G: "How much?"
Celestial: "Thirty-five cents."
Y-U-G: "Beg Pardon."
Celestial: "Forty-five."
Y-U-G: "Sorry, I guess I heard the first time."

ODE TO THE SUN

Hail! hyperdiaphanous and superlustrous orb of day,
In whose effulgent beams with joy lusorious insects play;
Before thy face the nebulous mists hasten to deliquesce,
And quickly from thy countenance all adumbrations press.

Fructiferous trees, bacciferous shrubs, own thy vivific ray;
Cornuted rams and flocculent sheep disporting, love thy sway.
The garnish rooster ambulates with turgent, pompous mien,
And peacocks o'er the vernal sward display their caudal sheen!

When thou dost appropinquate towards this terraqueous sphere,
The corniscations vesperline cause adscititious cheer;
Thine evanescent nitency shines mid the viminal trees,
And bathes in richest splendour the broad voliferous seas.

Journal, Dec. 6, 1873.

Prof. L. Haugh Conducted University Church Service

Professor Lynn Harold Haugh of Drew University, Madison, N.J., was the preacher at the University service held in Chalmers' Church, Sunday evening. Taking as his theme, "Creative Enthusiasm," Dr. Haugh chose his text from Habakkuk 3:19, "He maketh my feet like hind's feet." "The singing zest" which the prophets had, and which belonged to other generations, was a vital part of religion. This generation must regain that quality, if life is to be saved from dullness and heaviness. To what extent this was possible in our day, and what was its source, were the questions discussed.

Aerial Instructor: "Of course you can readily see what it means to drop fire bombs on the enemy's vast stores at night."

Cadet: "Sure! Fire sales the next morning."

Pain

A man with a tooth-ache is likely to contemplate homicide when assured by a well-meaning but tactless friend that pain is very necessary to man's continued existence in his present hostile and dangerous environment, but the sensation is really an important factor in man's defence mechanism. An aching tooth demands treatment; an anaesthetically decaying tooth would in most cases be neglected, and might cause a serious or even fatal septicaemia. Cancerous growths of the eye cause intense suffering and are on that account usually treated early and successfully, but the unfortunate absence of pain in most neoplasms leads very often to procastination in the seeking of treatment until the condition is advanced to a hopeless stage. The burned child does not fear the fire on account of the tissue damage following a burn, but because of the pain associated with it.

The degree of pain naturally varies with the structure in which the lesion begins. Injuries to the eye or tumours growing there are particularly troublesome, while much more extensive lesions in the abdominal cavity may cause only vague symptoms. The pain in the neck is one of life's most pressing problems, but is never nearly so serious as some pains located elsewhere.

Before physiological experimenters, with increasing thoroughness and accuracy of method, demonstrated that pain, temperature, touch and other varieties of sensation are appreciated through different sense organs, using different pathways for communication with the brain, some sects of philosophers believed that pleasure and pain resulted from the same causative factors, the difference being one of degree only. This view is still held to be true to a certain extent. The shock of a cold plunge is painful, yet custom has brought us to the acceptance of the painful sensation as a pleasurable one.

The fear of pain is much worse than pain itself. The local condition is frequently magnified by an excited or fearful mental condition, and conversely, there are exalted mental states during which a great deal of pain may pass almost unnoticed. The ability to interpret sensory impulses accurately must follow the education of nerve centres and a sensation to which one is unaccustomed may seem painful only because it is strange. In such cases a repetition of the experience usually brings the realisation that the painful factor was largely imaginary.

Perhaps the commonest of the dolors which afflict humanity is the headache, a condition which is very seldom primary, being as a rule a consequence of some other systemic disturbance. The symptomatic treatment of headaches, for which a multitude of nostrums is advertised, is therefor useless and may be dangerous. The taking of sedative drugs for the relief of the secondary condition is much like covering up a thermometer because it registers an undesirably high temperature. When the cause is diagnosed and eliminated, the headache disappears naturally.

Pain and castor oil and social virtue are necessities, are blessings in fact, but we can hardly be expected to like them on that account.

AVE AT QUE VALE

It would seem appropriate for the writer of this year's Campuscope to bid his reader or readers good-bye in this last issue, since his association with those hypothetical persons through the medium of the journal is to be terminated now for ever. The column has been neither criticised nor commended this year, as far as can be ascertained. In fact, the results of guarded enquiry have not been such as to encourage the belief that it has been read at all. However, the prime motive for the undertaking of the responsibility was hope of personal entertainment on the writer's part, a hope that has been fully realised, so that the torch may now be passed on without either unseemly relief or undue regret.

And in case the headline should trouble some already over-worked student, a translation is offered—Hello—Good-bye.

Journal Established In Snodgrass' Time

Rev. William Snodgrass, D.D., Principal of Queen's 1864-77, was Principal of the University at the time of the inception of the Queen's Journal in 1873.

Principal Snodgrass was a man whose name is prominent in the history of Queen's. In a period of great financial embarrassment he worked persistently to enable the college to weather the storm. The loss of the greater part of the college revenues as a result of the withdrawal of the Government grant from the University in 1869, together with the failure of the Commercial Bank, in which a large portion of the available funds had been invested, led Principal Snodgrass and Professor John Mackerras to open a campaign, in the course of which, largely through their efforts, contributions were collected to the amount of $100,000. Thus the pressing emergency was met and progress was made towards establishing Queen's on a firm and independent basis.

In 1877 Dr. Snodgrass resigned the Principalship after a term of office extending over one of the most difficult periods in the history of the University. He was succeeded by the Rev. George Monro Grant, D.D.

The Queen's College Journal for October 20th, 1877, in an editorial entitled "The Principalship," said of the retiring Principal:

"Principal Snodgrass did not and could not boast of extensive scholastic acquirements . . . . . But, fortunately for Queen's, he possessed an ability and capacity which in a supreme juncture in its affairs were vastly more valuable than profound condition or elegant scholarship. He steered the University ship safely through stormy weather when it must have foundered and gone down had a more learned but less courageous and cool-headed man been stationed at the helm."

Levana Society Held Last Meeting Of Year

The final meeting of the Levana Society was held Wednesday evening at Ban Righ Hall when pins were presented and the Levana debating team and the conveners for next year's L.A.B. of C. were elected. At the annual meeting which followed the regular meeting, the new officers were installed and athletic awards were distributed.

Miss Laird awarded Dorothy Wilkins, Ada Adams, Bessye Sheffield and Kathleen Morrison with the debating pins and this ceremony was followed by the presentation of flowers to Miss Laird and Miss Allen by the Levana Executive as a token of appreciation for their help throughout the year.

The conveners for the L.A.B. of C. were chosen as follows: Tennis, Ruth Fishleigh; soft ball, Jean Cameron; ground hockey, Marion Hayes; swimming, Sally Farlinger; basketball, Beatrice Yuill; ice hockey, Aileen Mason.

The new president, Mary McLennan received the cap and gown of office following the installation of the other new officials and the retiring president, Hilda Landon, was presented with flowers and the gold "L" of Levana.

Miss Murphy distributed the athletic awards to the intercollegiate and year teams, gold "Q's" being received by Doreen Kenny, Jo Tett, Isa Galbraith, Nora McGinnis and Dorothy Napthali. The meeting closed with the reading of the history, prophecy and poem for the year.

Careers Of French Kings Traced By Dr. L. J. Austin

Dr. L. J. Austin, the guest speaker at the recent English Club meeting held in the amphitheatre of the Richardson Laboratory, gave an illustrated lecture on "The Lives and Deaths of the French Kings". Dr. Austin traced the careers of the successive rulers of France and showed the effects of disease on the makers of French history.

C.O.T.C. Starts Movement For Credit On Certificates

A movement has been started in the C.O.T.C. to have credit given to those earning surplus marks on their "A" and "B" certificate exams. It will mean that a student in the C.O.T.C., who earns more than the required amount of marks to pass his certificate, can have these marks allowed to him on some regular university course in which he has fallen down. This is not by any means an innovation as ideas similiar to this have been in practice at McGill and other Canadian Universities, as well as in U.S. State Universities where military training is allowed as an optional course, Col. Wilgar said when interviewed.

The idea has already been endorsed by the Science Faculty, and must meet the approval of the other faculties and Senate before it will go into force.

To The Members Of The Class Of '33

It is only a matter of a few short weeks until most of the members of '33 will be leaving Queen's, diploma in hand, to return no more—except on those rare occasions when reunions bring together the few who can drop the duties of the workaday world and come back to meet old friends. Therein lies the poignancy of graduation. The ties of friendship made during four or six happy years of undergraduate life are put to a severe test, the test of distance. New associations will be made in the outside world, and though some college friendships will remain throughout the years as the strongest in your lives, many others are liable to pale and vanish.

It is in this sphere of personal ties and intercourse that membership in the General Alumni Association offers the greatest inducement. That the Association is performing valuable work in perpetuating the solidarity of the ever-growing alumni body of Queen's is recognized by the graduating student. But for him or her the more important thing is that the General Alumni Association offers through its publication, "The Queen's Review," a means of keeping track of classmates. No amount of personal correspondence can afford so many intimate glimpses of Queen's friends as can be gleaned from the columns of the "Review". It is the periodical of the graduates, as the "Journal" is that of the students. Published monthly, with the exception of June, July and September, it provides regular information of the progress of the University, of College activities, of the monuments and success, the joys and sorrows of one's friends.

Other services which are performed by the Association behind the scenes and which are available to its members are the keeping of accurate address lists along with up-to-date geographical and professional records of all graduates and large numbers of non-graduate alumni. Through its central office, too, class reunions are systematized and facilitated.

As time goes on, the students now graduating will also come to appreciate the less tangible services which the General Alumni Association performs. It knits all alumni into an organization capable of concerted action on behalf of the University. Thus your continued and active interest in your Alma Mater becomes one of the greatest boons in her possession; your individual goodwill is united through the Alumni Association with that of seventy-two hundred other Queen's men and women. The result is a great force capable of promoting the welfare of the University and of stimulating interest in Queen's wherever her alumni go.

Finally, graduating students locating in centres where branches of the Alumni Association exist, will find these helpful and congenial. Get in touch with the branch in your vicinity and benefit by the contacts which you will make with older Queen's alumni.

The membership fee of the General Alumni Association is small—three dollars a year—and it includes your subscription to the "Review." The fees paid by members of the graduating class hold good until September 30, 1934, thus including an extra period of six months with the first year. Before College closes you will receive both an Alumni Record form and a membership blank. Please fill in the record form and return it for our files. If you cannot join the Association now, retain the membership blank and become a member as soon as possible.

On behalf of the alumni body of Queen's I extend to the graduating class best wishes for happiness and prosperity throughout the future.

GORDON J. SMITH,
Secretary-Treasurer,
The General Alumni Association of Queen's University.

War Editions Contain Interesting Letters

The Great War has furnished many a periodical with thrilling, touching and in many cases with heart-rending stories. The pages of the Journal during the feverish years of this great struggle to end all wars carried its quota of war stories. It can be justly said that the Journals of those years were the most interesting ever published so completely did they present a picture of the life at the front by means of the many letters received from Queen's men engaged in this mighty conflict. Practically every issue carried letters describing the eventful existence of Queen's men on the battle front. The pages of the Journal also tell the story of the struggle at home—a struggle to keep the University functioning as it had under normal times.

In an issue dated October 8th, 1915, the following foreword appeared:

"The war cloud that hung over us last session is still with us. A large number of students and graduates from Queen's have gone, or are preparing to go, to the front. Many of us are prevented by various causes from active army service: but none the less we share the responsibility with those who represent us on the field, for the battle which they are fighting is ours as well as theirs. We continue in the quiet privileges of our University life, privileges at present denied to them because they are taking our place as well as their own in this conflict.

"Are we worthy of their heroic sacrifice, worthy of the outlay of noble life that will cause the names of St. Julien and Festubert to stand among the most memorable in the battles waged for liberty and righteousness? Only by sharing the same spirit of service and self-sacrifice can we be fit to take rank with those who are fighting for us."

One of the most interesting letters published in the early issues of 1915 was that received from a member of the 2nd Contingent Queen's Engineers describing what occurred to Lieut. Baker, well-known at Queen's at that time. The letter reads in part:

"Our hearts are all sore to-day (Oct. 11th) on account of our first casualty. Last night a shot grazed one eye and completely destroyed the other of Lieut. Baker. None of us know or can find out whether he will ever see again. A rather serious incident happened in this section of the trenches and it was so unexpected that the infantry were temporarily rattled. Baker quickly collected his squad of engineers, gave them hand grenades, got a machine gun, put it where it would be effective and then waited the German attack—which never came. All this, of course, was infantry work, but he had it all done before they thought of it. The following night before going into the trenches, he was laughing with another officer about one of the men who had yelled, 'I'm dead, I'm dead,' when a bullet grazed him. Well, he went out and he was directing operations and keeping men from crossing the danger zone, when he was struck. 'Well, boys, they got me,' was what he said, and so they carried him away."

Another letter closes with these interesting words: "Now comes the real reason for writing this letter. While we are averse to giving any hints and it is below our dignity to ask for charity, still an extra copy of the Journal would be eagerly read by the boys who have still a warm spot for their Alma Mater."

Describing an act of heroism for which a Queen's man was awarded a D.S.O. a news story in an issue dated November 5, 1915, read in part as follows:

"At this point the Germans were very strongly entrenched and supported by wire entanglements and machine guns. An attack by the British was planned at this point so some means had to be found for preparing the way for the infantry. Under the direction of Lieut. Craig and Lieut. Kelley, two 18-pound guns were taken into the first line of trenches, separated from the German lines by a distance of 75 yards. All this work was done under cover of darkness. The guns were dismounted and taken forward piece by piece. The wheels of the guns were covered with old automobile tires, and as the guns were mounted they were completely buried amid bags of sand. The following afternoon each lieutenant took five men with him and 150 rounds of ammunition and proceeded to carry out their orders. Fifteen minutes before the infantry attack was timed to take place the sand bags were torn down and two guns opened fire at point blank range. They smashed the enemy's parapet, blew three machine guns to pieces and swept all the barbed wire entanglements from the German trenches. Lieut. Craig fired 100 rounds in the time allowed. The infantry then advanced taking successive German lines of trenches. Lieut. Craig was seriously wounded in the attack, but recovered. This attack took place about the middle of June, 1915, in the vicinity of Stony Mountain.

Arts Wins Interfaculty Title By Beating Science

Emerging victorious in a series with Medicine which necessitated three games to settle the issue, the Arts Interfaculty hockey team went on to greater honours by defeating Science for the College title.

Science went into the final round by a virtue of a bye. This final match was easily won by Arts who piled up a score of 4 to 1 against their opponents.

The Interfaculty championship series produced some of the best hockey seen at Queen's this year.

Book Chats

By R.M.

Three of my five years' connection with the Journal have been spent in writing gratuitous blurbs for book publishers—so my friends would have me believe. This business of reviewing is a thankless business, perhaps, a useless one. For only once in an aeon does a writer of "notices" come upon a book review that upholds him in his opinions; even then the other reviewer may have lifted your ideas; and worse still, the readers may think both critics unmitigated fatheads.

And the readers are sometimes right. Every reviewer worthy of the name has felt the lure of lucre, in the form of parcels of new books.

Many have prostituted their talents and debased their souls in the hope of having their sentences quoted on the front of a flaming book jacket. Even the Journal reviewer must plead guilty to such an ignoble desire (if only he had kept on writing nice eulogistic blurbs he might not now be on the publishers black-lists.)

This mercenary old world of ours has, indeed, made it hard for reviewers to practice the Macaulay-Jeffrey style of criticism. It is much easier and much more profitable to say facetious complimentary things about a book than to ferret out its fallacies and short comings. People who read the newspapers want to be amused and entertained rather than instructed and enlightened. However true this may be there are certain out-standing exceptions and I think the Journal can claim to be one of them.

For one thing this paper is an independent organ, and our aim has been consistently to exercise independence of judgment. To spike all guns at the outset we would like to state that real criticism, whether of literature, painting or music, begins in appreciation as recorded in aesthetic judgment. Positively, criticism does not consist in picking a thing to pieces or pointing out its shortcomings without reference to the work of art as a whole. The author had a purpose—very well, did he realize that purpose? If so, how? If not, why not? And what is the universal significance of his work? One must attempt, at least, to answer these questions: any tribunal that fails to take cognizance of them is not giving the writer a fair trial.

A thousand and one things, of course, have intervened to hinder us from practicing this philosophy to the full: the press of time, human weakness and pitiable lack of erudition. But we meant well. A man can but do but his best and my grandfather did not draw a good long bow at the battle of Hastings, so I have not dishonoured his memory.

I wish to thank all those who have contributed reviews to this column.

Rabbi Eisendrath To Speak In Convocation Hall, April 4

Phil Stuchen, president of the International Relations Club, has informed the Journal that the subject of Rabbi Eisendrath's address at Convocation Hall on April 4 will be "Danger Zones of the Present World." In view of the fact that war news and the possibilities of further outbreaks are being featured in the press, Rabbi Eisendrath's topic is timely. In addition, his public speaking qualities are such that attendance at the open meeting on April 4th will be beneficial as well as stimulating.

Members of the International Relations Club will meet the Rabbi personally in the afternoon preceding his public address. Further information will be forthcoming within the next few days.

Ancient Files Show Headline Evolution

Apparently the headline writers in those days wrote a sentence for a head and if it was too long stuck the overflow on the line below. The practice of taking material for the heads out of the first paragraph or lead was commenced at this time and decks were used to supplement the heads.

It was customary to run a part of a sentence in capitals and then finish the rest of it in italics as the deck. A good example of this is THE FINAL YEAR DANCE, was attended by four hundred guests, and ICE CREAM VANISHED, yet Arts Fourteen enjoyed its social evening.

Heads in small capitals like A Demonstrator Injured, were common and considered all right in those days. The modern headline writer who tried to steal a colorless head like that past the Editor would hear things. Present practice requires some more interesting details or facts.

In 1913 the Journal printers must have obtained some new type as a larger size becomes increasingly evident. The A. M. S. elections in that year were the signal for a great display of cuts which were artistically placed so as to break up long stories and make attractive looking pages. In the next two years little change was made in headline writing custom, and drab, cryptic heads were used. The inside pages were left with small heads which made them look dead and lifeless.

Inside heads were first used on a large scale in 1918. Many heads were used. The printers must have acquired some more type in 1920 for new and more interesting heads appear on the pages. One head on the front page of the March 16th issue, 1920, Breaks Against Queen's Juniors, seems to show that the word Breaks is not the latest thing in slang. In the same year the Journal was threatened with a shortage of copy and a blank space was filled with two lines in black face type. Copy Wanted. Copy Wanted. Whether or not this warning terrified reporters into greater reliability cannot be ascertained.

Queen's won the Dominion Rugby Championship in 1922 and the progressive steps toward it are exultantly proclaimed in the streamers which became a feature of the Journal pages. On November 22, Victory! Queen's Humble Haughty Foe, was run as a streamer across the front page and farther down a cartoon, eight inches high and as wide as the page, depicting Queen's well on the way to a Dominion championship was used. A head, two columns wide was run below, Tricolor Smothered Varsity and Wins Intercollegiate Championship and below that in smaller letters the terse comment, We've waited eighteen years for this.

A week later the Queen's team defeated the Argos and the Journal celebrated the occasion by breaking into another streamer, They All Look Alike To Us, which was supplemented by the lead on the story of the victory, No Golden Fleece For The Argonauts.

Queen's Scintillating Galaxy Of Stars Stops The Mighty Argos—First Argo Defeat in Years—Leadley's Drop Thwarted Old Man Defeat in Dying Moments — An Unforgettable Struggle, was run below the head as a deck. 'Scintillating Galaxy of Stars' should have been glaring enough to call forth the denunciations of the professors.

Another series of victories brought forth the streamer, Victorious Week-End For Queen's, and below that as a two column head, Who Said Queen's Was Not A Winning Team.

The front page of the Journal on February 27, 1923, was very unusual when compared with former front pages. A streamer across the top of the page announced, McGill Wins Assault—Queen's Die Hard. Twelve stories were run on front page, an unprecedented number for the Journal and they all carried the same size heads with elaborate decks. A three inch ad. across the bottom of the front page advertised a performance of Shaw's Candida.

The editorial staff in 1925 must have been actuated by a grim sort of humour when they ran a streamer across the first issue, Thirteen Weeks Till Xmas Exams. Perhaps they were hard up for news or were potential tabloid newspapermen. From this time on many streamers were used until they became useless as the value of streamers depends on their rarity. One hear, The University of Western Ontario with the words, Rich in possibilities, added below, as if it were an afterthought, is an example of what heads should not be. It suggests no complete thought and is too cryptic to be of any use.

An amusing two-line streamer used a year later deserves mention here. All Roads Lead to Toronto. Catch Your Freight at the Junction. In another issue a cut supposed to be the photograph of the Varsity scoreboard after the same game informed everybody of the overwhelming score piled up by Queen's. The cut is about eight inches square and is stuck in one corner where it strikes the eye immediately. A bad example of personal or editorial comment in a head appears in the same issue. The head reads, Varsity Humbled Saturday When Tricolor Outplayed Vaunted Team At Every Turn. So far so good and rather appropriate, but below the deck the significant sentence, American Plays Not For Canadians, is added in black type.

Another head worth mentioning is Strong Punch At Gymnasium, which leaves itself open to two meanings and violates all the canons of headline writing. A fine attempt at alliteration appears about this time — Snappy Science Studes Stage Sinless Syncopation Skilful But Not Skittish. This is almost as good as the head in the fall of 1931 which caused a sensation in more ways than one. Steamer Stalls Strauding Students, Frolicking Festivities Follow Fog. This is a noble effort at alliteration when one remembers that every letter takes up a definite amount of space and that words have to be carefully selected so that they will express some meaning as well as fit the space alloted.

For one edition the Journal replaced the Crest between the words Queen's and Journal with a little box, in which were set lines containing the words Special Law Brow Edition and below that a streamer announcing a B. W. F. assault.

Sons Of Demasthenes Clash To-Day, Convocation Hall Crowded For Windy Session, a two line streamer is a flagrant example of what is called Journalese and must have been greeted with scorn by professors and students advocating pure English.

History Of University Dates Back Century

The history of the foundation of the University of Queen's College, Kingston, may be traced back to the early '30's of the last century. In 1833 a Commission was appointed by the Synod of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, to solicit subscriptions for the endowment of the college and to apply for an Act of Incorporation to the Provincial Legislature. Enthusiastic support was received.

It is not generally realized that in this work Mr. (afterwards Sir) John A. Macdonald played a prominent part. In fact, to quote from a later account contained in "Queen's University, An Illustrated Sketch of its Foundation, Growth and Present Proportions, published by Queen's Quarterly as a souvenir of the Installation of Principal Gordon and the Jubilee of the Medical Faculty, October 14, 15, 16, 1903," the "Fathers of Queen's" were Sir John A. Macdonald, Rev. Robert McGill, Hon. William Morris, Rev. Alex Gale, Hon. John Hamilton, Rev. William Rintoul, Rev. John Machar, Rev. John Cook, and Rev. John Hamilton. The account continues:

"Chief among the promoters of the scheme were (these) distinguished men, whose unflagging zeal carried them safely through the grave financial and educational difficulties which beset the undertaking. . . . They were men of great intellectual and moral force, and their support was no doubt a large factor in the success of Queen's."

tering a dry goods store for men's furnishings. But with the advent of special gentlemen clerks to look after them that feeling is rapidly passing away."

Referring to Laidlaw's——"Another of this firm's great specialties is a natural fleece-lined nightgown. The front, neck and cuffs are finished with Roman satin; it is full-size and guaranteed to be unshrinkable. It costs only 99 cents. No student need shiver in a cold bed this winter. (Oh, Emmaline!)

Another Queen's Club is to be revived after a few years of inactivity. The Chess and Checkers Club will meet in the Small Math. Room, New Arts Building, on Wednesday afternoon at 5 o'clock.

Comedy Hampered By Failure Of Power

Handicapped by technical difficulties which were the result of power break in the Queen's Power Plant, the Dramatic Guild's production of Androcles and the Lion was not equal to former productions staged by the Guild. After a wait of an hour, during which the small audience was entertained by impromptu speeches, the Guild were able to proceed with the performance.

Professor Roy had given the audience an idea of Shaw's intentions in writing the farce and had explained the nature of the dialogue and the action.

The farce itself was amusing in that the characters said and did extraordinary things, but the players did not succeed in carrying the spirit of the play across the footlights. Scarth Macdonnell as Androcles was the most convincing of the large cast, although the Lion roared and acted as one would imagine a lion would under the circumstances. Lebo Ware as Lavinia and Horatio Todd as Ferrovius showed an intensity and depth of feeling that made each role more vivid. The long wait between scenes tired an overly patient audience and spoilt the continuity of the play.

The Saturday night performance was not handicapped by unforeseen and technical difficulties. The players were more at home in their parts and the farcical situations in the play were acted with greater vivacity. The large audience enjoyed the sprightly wit of a Shaw play given in the true Shavian manner.

An extra performance of Androcles and the Lion was given in Convocation Hall last night.

English Rugger Club Forced To Postpone Proposed Game

At a meeting of the Rugger Club held recently, Ranald Macdonald read a letter from Macdonald College, asking for a game in Kingston at the beginning of April. The members of the Club felt, however, that such a scheme was impossible owing to the proximity of examinations, but it was hoped that a fixture might be arranged for next season.

B-ak-o-k: May I go out to-night, sir?"

Doctor: "I'll have to know who she is and where she lives, first sir."

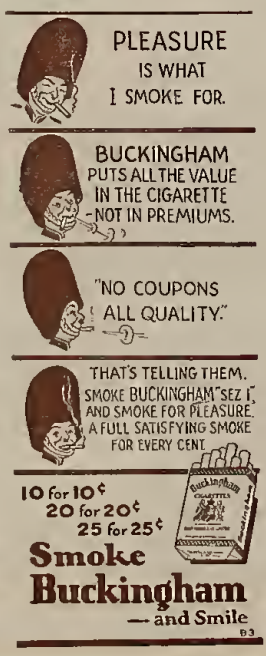
SPORTS SLANTS

This issue says goodbye to many Queen's athletes, whose names will not decorate the pages of the Journal in future. It isn't possible to name them all but they have given Queen's their very best and the university appreciates it.

* * * * * *

One of the most outstanding is Howie Carter, last year's captain of the rugby squad. Howie has aided in bringing glory to Queen's for many years, and his educated toe has been instrumental in winning many games for the Tricolor.

* * * * * *



Another who should be mentioned is Harry McLaughlin of the senior basketball team. Six years of Intercollegiate competition is his record and one that will take some beating.

* * * * * *

Perhaps the A. B. of C. can figure out why the Junior hockey team that travelled so far, will not be given "Q's". The members of the team are not feeling so cheerful about it after displaying their talents so effectively.

* * * * * *

Well here's luck to all the university athletes in their contests with the profs. May the profs be sent off for illegal work if they put on any tricky questions.

THE JOURNAL STAFF OF 1893-'94

Journal Staff Of 1893-'94 Included Many Who Later Achieved Fame And Fortune In Their Chosen Fields Of Endeavour

The picture reproduced above is a cut of the Journal Staff for 1893-94. The Kingston Whig-Standard commented some time ago upon the unusual number in that group of twenty-five who, in after life, achieved celebrity in their chosen fields. This newspaper declared, "It is doubtful if any other Canadian of American university can show a student group who became as distinguished in their later life as that of the young men and women composing the Queen's Journal staff thirty-nine years ago".

At least eleven members of the group have achieved marked distinction, and possibly others might be included if the information were available. E. R. Peacock is one of the greatest figures in world finance. He is receiver-general of the Duchy of Cornwall, a director of the Bank of England, and a possible successor to the present governor, Sir Montagu Norman. S. A. Mitchell ranks among the greatest astronomers of our day. He is professor of astronomy and director of the Leander McCormick Observatory at the University of Virginia. He is an authority on solar eclipses and has made special trips to observe every one of these phenomena during recent years. W. B. Munro has also been captured by the United States, where he is recognized as one of the country's foremost authorities on constitutional history and government. For twenty years he was on the staff of Harvard University, eventually becoming head of the division of History, Government and Economics. He is at present living in Pasadena, Calif. Dr. A. E. Ross was chief of the Canadian Army Medical Corps in France during the Great War. He now represents Kingston in the Dominion Parliament. Dr. C. F. Lavell was dean of the Faculty of Education at Queen's for some time, and for several years past had been professor of the History of Thought at Grinnell College, Iowa. Dr. E. C. Watson, a son of Dr. John Watson, of Queen's, is a leading eye specialist in Detroit, Mich. Dr. Robert Laird is one of the leaders of the United Church in Canada, and Rev. J. S. Shortt, a brother of the late Dr. Adam Shortt, is moderator of Kingston Synod and one of the prominent men in the Presbyterian Church in Canada. The late Frank Hugo became Republican Secretary of State for New York. J. M. Mowatt was a prominent Kingston lawyer; he was killed overseas. Miss Alletta Marty, now deceased, was very well known as a public school inspector in the city of Toronto, and was recognized as an authority on educational matters.
